"Bah!" he said. "I am the Catspaw, and Evarts—is the Cat!

With barely a glance at the locked drawer in his desk he got up and went into the outer room. "Barty," he called, "I'm bound for home. Lay everything over till to-morrow, will you?" And Barty nodded "Sure."

He walked up as far as Schuyler Square, crossing the old landmark of the city with short, decisive puffs at his cigar. It had once been a world of men and affairs, but now there was left only its row of old-fashioned houses, and the loungers' benches in an open brown square where children played. He might have asked Marian to call for him in the car, but she would probably be off shopping, or at some frequented tea-room; he rather hoped, on the whole, that she would not be at home; he somehow dreaded seeing her. He had his speech to finish off, and the matter of the shares worried him. He knew, if he told her, just how she would look, and what she wouldn't say! She would smile at first, like Colonel Duplane; afterward—but he refused to evolve it, since there need be no afterward.

She was sitting waiting for him, however, in the hall. "Hello, Mr. Mayor," she said, and lifted up her face to be kissed. As he went to his room she followed, chatting in her girlish way.

"I took lunch at the Leslies, your honor, and I was so proud"—she made mock courtesy. "They all say you're so young for the job! But they all say you'll make good—the idea! When you're the cleverest thing this old city has ever picked out. Mrs. Paine, though, made me cross. She said, "Well, he's old enough to be honest, anyway"—just because her husband happens to be a—a scalawag—" But he stopped her.

"I wouldn't, dear, talk like that; besides—" he suddenly put an arm about her. "You like it—having me what I am?"

She nodded. "I love it, the bigness of it, and the honor—"

"Oh, it's big," he agreed, "but the honor! Suppose there wasn't any, except the outside shell; suppose everything inside was the—other thing?"

She smiled into his face. "Stupid! —then you'd make it over. You wouldn't let it go on so an hour!"

She had wandered to the window, looking out to the crowded avenue beyond their quiet street, and she did not see his face. He went on into his dressing-room, something clutching at his throat. "Coward!" he whispered, "coward!" and sat down, staring at the floor. At that moment Evarts seemed a thing outside; it was himself whom he hated.

"What is it, Marian?" He was conscious that she was calling him.

"Oh!" she cried, "come quickly." She had fallen away from the window, covering her eyes. It knocked him down," she cried, "an old man—it was an express automobile! Oh, run, dear, and see if he is much hurt!"

Fifteen minutes later he came back to her, pale and shaken.

She met him on the threshold. "Was he badly hurt? I saw the ambulance—"

His eyes traveled beyond her, to things she could not see. "I don't know—they think it may be only shock—but he is old—"

She nodded, quick tears filling her eyes. "Why didn't they bring him in here—to us?"

"I tried to get them to," he said wearily; "it was Colonel Duplane."

She started back. "The man who tried to beat you?"

He looked at her a moment strangely. "The man who has beaten me," he said—and would say no more.

Fordyce was at his office the next day, early, but Barty had already seen the papers. "You ripped them up," he said, "last night, sir."

Fordyce nodded. "Yes, I ripped them up." He stood a moment, pulling off his gloves. "I wish you'd call up St. Agatha's," he said, "and ask after Colonel Duplane. They took him there yesterday. Just find out, will you, if I can see him some time this afternoon. And Barty, if Senator Evarts calls—well, no matter, just send him in. That's all."

He busied himself about a hundred things—and waited. It would be the difficult hour, he knew, of his life. His speech had torn off the edge of Evarts's universe, but he meant to face him squarely.

Evarts, at first, seemed to evince no desire to be faced at all; when he did come, some time after the lunch hour, he wore the look of a man used to straightening the world's tangles, and who expected to overcome this particular knot in the mayoralty with definite, but soothing fingers.

"Well," he said, "young man, you're evidently not tired of brass bands, are you? What sort of music do you want to dance to now—reform? It won't go! The tune's too old and the key's too confounded high for this city! He sat down in the visitor's chair, laying his top-hat carefully beside him.

Fordyce shook his head. "I can't help it," he said, "Evarts, if I've disappointed you."

Evarts looked across at him. "What are you up to anyway? Didn't you see Manners?"

"Yes. Manners made your points quite clear."

Evarts puffed at the ceiling. "You successfully avoided them—last night."

"I intended to." Fordyce was pale but serious.

Evarts leaned forward. "Look here," he said, "you're a very young man to be mayor, but you're it—for the present!"

Fordyce nodded.

"For the present only," went on Evarts. "There's such a thing as a knockout blow—in politics."

"I understand," said Fordyce.

"But it never occurs," added Evarts, "until the leader gives the word."

"I understand that also."

"Well, what are you going to do about it, Fordyce?"

Fordyce lifted his eyes. "Merely wait for you to give the word!"

There was a sharp silence. "Look here," said Evarts, and he rose, "I've held this city under my thumb a number of times in my lifetime for its own good, or any amount you like of the other thing. Anyway—you know that folks have said that "Evarts and the farmers do it all." But that's neither here nor there. I'll not speak to you of my personal ambition in the matter, or of anything you may owe to me —but I will speak of the loyalty due to your party!"

Fordyce fluttered his eyelids. "I wish to uphold my party on the platform on which I went in, Senator Evarts."

The senator laughed. "You mean that reform flavor? You knew as well as I did that that was rot!"

Fordyce breathed deeply. "Perhaps I did—nevertheless, as far as I have any power it stands now!"

Evarts spoke again, still calmly. "What about the governor's chair?"

"I shall never sit in the governor's chair. It's outside the question."

Evarts wiped his forehead. "What do you gain by this deal, anyway?"

"Nothing, that I can explain to you. It isn't in your line. It isn't," added Fordyce honestly, "in my own. It belongs entirely to the idealist, to the dreamer of dreams—to the man who has given, perhaps, an arm to his country—not to you and me!"

The senator measured him with unflinching eyes. "You were too young," he said, "for the game, after all."

"Young enough," frowned Fordyce, "to be honest!" He turned the key in the lock drawer and threw across the desk a sheet of folded paper." It belongs to Lloyd, Robertson & Company —a certificate for a hundred shares in their holdings. But I can't afford the investment."

Evarts rose. "So," he said sharply, "you are cutting loose, Fordyce."

"From bribery and rottenness; yes."

"And you think, you fool, you can play the game alone?"

"At least," Fordyce faced him, "while I play it, I'll play it square."

The senator, in red wrath, towered above the visitor's chair. "Curse you," he cried, "I believe you will!"

Puffed Wheat Puffed Rice

Prof. Anderson Brought to Us This Invention

It was wheat and rice kernels exploded by steam—puffed to eight times normal size.

They tasted like toasted nuts.

They seemed to us like cereal confections — the most delightful foods ever created.

But we asked for the people's judgment.

We opened a lunch room in the heart of New York, to which hundreds of people came daily.

And we offered them there—all at equal price—all sorts of cereal foods.

Four out of five who took ready-cooked cereals chose either Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice.

That settled the matter. We made the foods. And now 22,000,000 dishes monthly are consumed by delighted users.

Please Let the Children Choose

We ask you to do likewise.

Submit to your children the various ready-cooked cereals. Tell them to pick their choice.

You'll find that these puffed grains — crisp, porous and nut-like — are selected nine times in ten.

That's a fortunate fact. For these whole-grain foods, with every food granule blasted to pieces, are the most digestible foods in existence.

Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c
Except in Extreme West

These foods are not merely foibles.

They are scientific creations.

The grains are sealed up in bronze-steel guns. For an hour we revolve them in an oven heat of 550 degrees — until all the grains' moisture is changed to high-pressure steam.

Then that steam is exploded. And, by that explosion, the millions of food granules are literally blasted to pieces. Thus digestion can instantly act.

The puffed grains are four times as porous as bread. Yet the coats of the grain are unbroken.

Ways of Serving

In the morning serve them with cream and sugar. Or mix them with any fruit.

For luncheons, or suppers, or between-meal foods, serve like crackers in a bowl of milk.

Boys at play like to eat the grains dry. Girls use them in candy-making. In many such ways these nut-like grains take the place of nuts.

Let children eat them whenever they are hungry, for these puffed grains don't tax the stomach.

And begin today if you don't yet know how good these puffed foods are.

American Girl Papers

BY AN AMERICAN GIRL

Let those love now who never loved before;
Let those that always loved now love the more. —PARNELL.

In an Ocean of Love

OUR girlish lives are in an ocean of love so vast, so deep, that to measure the power of it is to set a candle in the sun or put out to sea in a cockleshell. All we can do is to do the best we can, to bring the most of it out into our lives.

There are no absolutely unlovable girls. There are only plenty of girls unawake to the magic of love—girls who do not love deeply, bravely, unselfishly enough to compel the love of others. It is with these girls that I want to talk. Let me tell you a legend that bears somewhat upon the subject.

A Heathen Legend

LONG ago an old and forgotten heathen deity, the god of enchantment, sent this word over the world: "I have discovered a glory so great that all who look upon it and see its beauty, all who listen and hear its music, shall be eternally happy and forever full of youth." Curious people came crowding and jostling to find out what such a message meant, and seeing nothing at all, went away unbelieving. Others peered and sought and asked questions; but the strenuous, hurrying masses passed by incredulous. "They peer about, but they do not see; their ears are dull, for they hear nothing; beauty pipes to them, but they will not dance," said the old enchanter. At last a troop of children came lilting by. "See the violets and the maple buds!" they cried. "Look! Look! The ragged robin is in the valley! The fields are yellow with cowslips! The trees are budding! Primroses, bluebells, lady's tresses are yonder on the sunny hills! Speckled trout are swimming up the stream! Come along! Come along!" they called, dancing away and laughing for joy. Still others came hurrying on impatient feet. "The cuckoos and nightingales are back! The plovers and swallows are skimming over the valley! The woods are full of birds! The meadows are blooming! The marshes are pink with mallow! Come! Come!" they shouted, and a few olders here and there from among the trooping crowds followed them. It was a supreme moment in the life of the old god. He had thought to make all people happy by discovering to them the deep, sweet secret of new life, new hope, new beauty everywhere; but only the children were awake to it; the others went dully about their dull affairs.

As I see the picture that the allegory paints I feel an impulse such as the Pied Piper must have had when he wanted to run away with the children and forever shield them from growing up into commonplace folk. Now just a word to the wise, my dears: I want to remind you here in our own Corner in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that we in a measure are the children of the legend, and it is not too soon to be warned. We must not allow our hearts, our eyes, our ears to grow dull to the enchantment of everyday life. Believe me, the day when the fairies of your little girlhood vanished and Santa Claus dwindled to a clay image on the Christmas tree, not a whit of enchantment or magic went out of the world. If some one had taken you by the hand that day and had told you the story of the cocoon hanging on the brown twig yonder, or had discovered your favorite legend of the Light Princess in a snow crystal with a perfect image of the sun shining in its heart, or had pointed out to you that the Sleeping Beauty who is pricked with a spindle is the story of the warm earth pierced by the sudden touch of the frost, and the brave Prince with his golden locks is the summer sun, whose warm kiss of love must break the spell, when beauty will awaken and follow him everywhere—if, I say, you had been told such stories as these, your faith in fairies to-day would be as bright as ever it was. The old enchanter's secret was nothing more than the secret of love. Believe me, dears, you cannot love too much, too abundantly, too sacredly. Do not be afraid of it. Unless we fill every day with love, love of God's world, love in the measures that God loves us, the sweet magic of it all will vanish from our lives like a birdsong into the night, and before we know it we shall belong to the dull crowds.

Girlhood

My little sermon will be of small avail unless we make it practical; and the way to best do that is just this: to live day by day right up to the high privileges of our girlhood. We are so precious in the glow of God's love, and the responsibilities that he has set for us are so clear, that we should be satisfied with nothing less than perfectness; a perfect daughter, full of the love that understands and is patient and kind; a perfect sister, tender, joyous, sympathetic, protecting, warm; a girl of girls. And perhaps next week we shall talk of the beautiful "next things" that come along naturally in the life of a girl.

Answer to Geography Puzzle, January 10

DURING the holidays I visited my uncle's farm in Arkansas. On our way from the depot the wheels of the carriage ran over a Pine Bluff. I fell out and bumped my head until it was Black as black could be. In the chicken run I stepped on a Leghorn hen and fell down and sprained my knee. By this time my Disappointment knew no bounds, and I Said I must return home. But Aunt Sophia, who is always kind and thoughtful, bade me cheer up. By the end of the week, when I had got only Midway in my visit, they made a large Bon fire to celebrate my departure and all on a Rainy day I bade Farewell to my Aunt Sophia and Uncle Albert, and returned home.

Brander Cushing's Ambition

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON

Author of "In His Steps"

CHAPTER XXI

A WHOLE year went by. Cushing's shipyard was still empty. But one of the greatest strikes in history was nearing its end. After months of suffering, hatred, loss, a settlement was reached. It might have been reached at the beginning if all the parties concerned had obeyed the teachings of the Prince of Peace. One side in the controversy had been as selfish and lacking in brotherhood as the other. Both sides had trampled on the Golden Rule and the rights and duties of man.

But one morning, Sidney opened his office window and watched the smoke curl up out of the big chimneys. At the end of the week, Cushing's shipyard clanged and roared and hammered and bellowed with its multitudinous and many-mouthed din. Four thousand men poured in at the gates and with hungry eagerness resumed labor, calling it sweet after the long idleness. And the Columbia again began to take shape and Sidney eyed it with awed astonishment and conflicting emotions.

That same week new business belonging to the resumption of the work called him again to Washington.

One evening at his hotel Ed Marston called to see him. Sidney was glad to meet him, although the meeting awoke some painful memories.

"I didn't know whether you would care to see me or not," said Ed, somewhat shyly. "But I wanted to see you, so I came over."

"I shall always be glad to see you, Marston. I hope you will never let anything get in the way of our friendship."

Marston was silent longer than usual. Finally he burst out:

"Say, Cushing, I can't help feeling mean about our family, about the way we've treated you. It's treating you like dirt. Old Unc' Marston is a prig. He tried to get me to excuse him for turning you down. But I wouldn't excuse him if he was the President and offered to resign in my favor. What do I care if you have changed your sentiments about war? What has that got to do with a man's or a woman's friendship? I used to think Aunt Lyddy and Pax had some sense, but—"

"Yes?"

"But they haven't got enough to ballast a birch-bark canoe. Tell you what, I feel ashamed of the Marston family, all but myself."

"Thank you, Marston. It means more than I can tell to have your friendship."

Marston looked at him doubtfully.

"You won't faint, will you, if I give out a bit of news that hasn't yet been signaled to the fleet?"

Sidney colored, but answered with a clear smile,

"No. You needn't fear."

"Well, it will be public in a few days. Aunt Lyddy wrote me that Pax is engaged to a Captain Lloyd-Hereford of His Majesty's Portsmouth fleet. Think of that! A captain with two L's to his front name and parted in the middle!"

"I wish her joy," said Sidney gravely.

"Well, I don't. I wanted you for my cousin. I never did like this fellow Lloyd hyphen Hereford."

"Say no more about it, Marston," said Sidney gently.

"Call the incident closed?"

"Yes."

"But not our friendship?"

"No; I think everything of you."

"If I can ever save you from drowning, drop me a line, won't you?" cried Marston eagerly. "There isn't a thing I wouldn't do for you, but it seems I can't be your cousin."

Sidney assured him that he reciprocated his feeling and went back to Dockville with his heart glowing over this friendship.

From this time on until the eventful day came when the Columbia was ready to be launched, Sidney entered on a new and powerful development of his whole nature.

He found time with all the rest to study the history of the church. Day after day, that institution loomed up grander and more fascinating. He was entering new cathedrals of beauty every day. All of the church's great record of service, sacrifice, heroism, martyrdom, unfolded before him.

During this time Sidney was unconsciously yielding to a growing interest in Hermosa Howard.

Long before, he had discovered that Hermosa was more than his equal intellectually. Her long-continued tutoring of her father had developed in her a quick and accurate mind, not only stored with knowledge but beautified by her use of it.

His visits to Mrs. Ward's and to the blind man had continued with growing trouble and unrest for Hermosa. Athanasia had simply accepted Sidney's presence as a joy unspeakable which for her simple soul might go on to all eternity without a change. It was enough for the crippled girl to sit and look at him. She would fold her hands and go over again the day of that rescue, when Sidney grasped her hand and pulled her in through the window.

One day Sidney was with Hermosa's father. Athanasia had not been well and had stayed home from the store that afternoon. Sidney had brought some models from the shop and was showing them to Mr. Howard when Athanasia came across the hall and in the freedom that was common with the two families entered the room. Sidney greeted her kindly, as he always did, and she sat down to listen to what he was telling Mr. Howard.

"Your prediction about the bigger battleship has already come true, Mr. Howard. The Columbia is not yet finished, but Great Britain yesterday laid the keel of a dreadnought that outmeasures ours by every dimension, and her new guns will carry a mile farther than ours. Germany is taking steps to outclass Great Britain and in a few months will begin a war monster that will make the Columbia look like an obsolete toy."

"The end must come soon," said the blind man calmly. "Is that you, Athanasia? "Won't you go to Hermosa's room and get me that book she has been reading called The Great Illusion, that's making such a stir in Europe?

Athanasia went into Hermosa's room, and brought out the book. Then she stood by Sidney's chair listening.

Suddenly she said: "Mr. Cushing, did you know Hermosa saved that board you found the day of the factory fire?"

"No!"

"She did, and she's got it in her room. I saw it just now. She found it down in the alley when it was cleared out."

Silence.

"Why should she want to keep that?"

"I think it is because she thinks so much of you. She never lets me touch the board, and she told me not to tell you, but I think you ought to know some time."

THE DOCTOR HABIT
And How She Overcame It.

When well selected food has helped the honest physician place his patient in sturdy health and free from the "doctor habit" it is a source of satisfaction to all parties. A Chicago woman says:

"We have not had a doctor in the house during all the 5 years that we have been using Grape-Nuts food. Before we began, however, we had "the doctor habit" and scarcely a week went by without a call on our physician.

"When our youngest boy arrived five years ago, I was very much run down and nervous, suffering from indigestion and almost continuous headaches. I was not able to attend to my ordinary domestic duties and was so nervous that I could scarcely control myself. Under advice I took to Grape-Nuts.

"I am now, and have been ever since we began to use Grape-Nuts food, able to do all my own work. The dyspepsia, headaches, nervousness and rheumatism which used to drive me fairly wild, have entirely disappeared.

"My husband finds that in the night work in which he is engaged, Grape-Nuts food supplies him the most wholesome, strengthening and satisfying lunch he ever took with him." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Sidney rose. Hermosa was coming into the room. He could not tell in the dim light whether she had heard Athanasia or not.

"My department closed early to-day on account of the remodeling of the store. Are you feeling better, Athanasia?"

"Yes. I think I can go to work tomorrow."

"I hope you can. Excuse me, Mr. Cushing, I am tired."

It was the first time in her life Sidney had ever heard her say those words. She went into her room and shut the door, and after a little while Sidney went away.

I think he dated from that hour his change of feeling towards Hermosa Howard. He had always respected her. He had even admired her. But no greater feeling had yet occurred to him. As long as Pax Marston was in his thoughts all else was impossible. But now—

In the big lonely house that night he began to call up Hermosa's personality. What did she look like? The very opposite of Pax Marston? Pax was vivacious, pretty, dainty, blue-eyed, a creature to be softly and carefully surrounded with every luxury and all that wealth and good breeding could pile up.

Hermosa was strong and rugged, black-haired and black-eyed, resolute, homely— No, not homely. What was it? She was—what? Commanding? Forceful? Masculine? No, not masculine; she was tender. Oh, how tender, as her strong hands arranged her father's hair and prepared his day's work. But was she a creature to be softly shielded from the world's storms? Nay, she would go out into the worst hurricane that ever beat, and with the man she loved, if she ever loved any man, walk through it as if it were a mild summer zephyr to be wooed. And she was keeping that blackened board! Why?

With that question ringing in his heart he fell asleep.

CHAPTER XXII

SEVERAL months went by. It was spring again, and the Columbia was at last finished. Brander Cushing's five years were completed and he would be a free man a week before the date fixed for the launching. He would be coming home. Home! Sidney sat down in the library and cried like a child at the thought of it. Tremendous things had occurred within that time. He knew now that the dearest person in the world to him now—yes, even more than his own father—was Hermosa. He trembled as he thought of her—of all it meant to him, of all it might mean to her. But since he had begun to love her as he never dreamed of loving any one he had noted her attitude towards him and he hoped—

He was going to call that evening. He was going to ask her if she could share life with him.

He found himself as in a dream of movements speaking to Hermosa's father as they talked over various subjects in which they had become interested. Hermosa was seated over by the window that looked out across the alley, that window through which he had drawn her and Athanasia that day five years and more ago.

Finally he found an opportunity to go over near her. Outwardly Hermosa was calm. In reality she was trembling and weak. I think she knew that Sidney was going to speak that night.

"Hermosa!" he said. It was the only time but once he had ever addressed her by that name.

Hermosa looked up and understood in a moment. But she did not move. Only she laid her work down on a table and covered her face.

"Hermosa, it seems that this is the place I must tell you—by this window where I first saw you. I did not know it then. But if God helped me to save you then, it was that we might be saved for each other."

Hermosa was crying.

"Oh, it cannot be. We are too far apart socially. It must not—"

"Hermosa, look up. I want to know only one thing. Do you love me?"

Hermosa looked up. And Sidney saw in a moment.

"Yes!" she was standing by him, by that window. The tragedy of both their lives seemed deepened by it, but through it the overmastering love of lovers rose to such a height that Hermosa Howard that night gave herself without reserve to the man who was to be her husband, and these two strong brave souls henceforth were to walk along the human path together hand in hand, heart to heart, to grow by suffering and by joy into one life.

They went over to Hermosa's father. He smiled when they told him.

"I knew it all the time," he said.

"I shall be jealous," cried Sidney. "Tell me, Hermosa, when did you first love me?" Foolish but eternal question of lovers.

Hermosa took his hand and led him to the window where they had first kissed each other.

"There!" she said as she flung her arm out. "There, as I looked across that day and saw you, I loved you, and I have been loving you ever since!"

Athanasia took the news with simple-hearted joy. "Hermosa is my sister. You will be my brother!" she said. And they all believed her. But deep in her heart, which was not feeble-minded, I think Athanasia Ward carries to her grave the other kind of love which she can never know in this world.

On the day of the launching, another distinguished group stood on the platform by the Columbia.

Brander Cushing was there, the object of curiosity to hundreds of observant eyes. The President of the United States was present and a crowd of famous fighters.

Hermosa was to christen the ship. She had yielded at Brander Cushing's earnest request. She had made a request that water be used instead of champagne and that she be allowed to speak a word as the ship went down the ways.

Father and son stood side by side, as Hermosa stepped forward just after the President's speech. She was at that moment the one figure commanding attention even beyond the Cushings or the chief of the nation.

She broke the flask of clear water over the bows and at the same instant exclaimed, "Long live the Republic! And may this ship never be used in war! And may we all live to see the reign of universal peace among the nations of the earth!"

As she stood there, she typified womanhood and childhood, the two who have always suffered most from war's horrors. She stood there, straight and strong, and patient and intelligent, a woman of the people, with a vision of a world from which the clang of war has given way to the harmony of peace. And she turned away that day from the greetings of the President and others, who had even there in their amazement caught something of the meaning of that hour, and with the man she loved and with his father, who had passed through his furnace to come out fine gold, she went her way with them. And Brander Cushing's ambition was satisfied.

THE FIGHT FOR "BREAD"

Not any kind of Bread, but the kind that contains all the nutriment in the Whole Wheat.

Although we are in the midst of prosperity we still have "the bread line"—not the long row of mendicants waiting their turn to get a loaf of bread, a familiar sight in the cities during "hard times"—but the "line" that is drawn by dietetic experts between white flour bread and the food products that contain the whole of the wheat grain.

The same old controversy is with us. After many expert investigations both in this country and England, the controversy simmers down to this conclusion:

1—White flour bread does not contain all the nutritive material in the whole wheat grain, but what little it does contain is digested and assimilated in the human body.

2—If the human stomach is to take up all the body-building nutriment stored in the whole wheat it must be prepared in a more digestible form than we find it in ordinary whole wheat flour bread.

Fortunately we have this ideal whole wheat food in Shredded Wheat Biscuit, which is just as different from ordinary graham or whole wheat flour bread as doughnuts are different from "zweibach."

Listen to one of the foremost pure food champions in this country. Speaking before the National Pure Food Congress in Philadelphia on October 23rd, Mr. Alfred W. McCann said:

"To produce white flour from the whole wheat grain requires the elimination of more than half the chemical elements which make wheat an ideal food for man. It pleases the eye, but fools the stomach.

What is more, I think it is not possible to buy in this country a real "whole wheat" flour. So in order to obtain the full nourishment which nature has put into wheat for man's benefit, in my home we use triscuit and shredded wheat biscuit instead of bread."

As to whether we can get "real" whole wheat flour in this country or whether it would be digested if made into ordinary bread there is much controversy.

As to the digestibility of Shredded Wheat Biscuit and Triscuit, however, there is no controversy. It contains all the nutriment in the whole wheat made digestible by steam-cooking, shredding and baking. It contains no yeast, baking powder or other chemicals. Whether you make it your "bread" or not you can keep your digestion healthy and your body strong and hearty by eating it every morning for breakfast with hot milk and a little cream. It also combines deliciously with fruits. Being ready-cooked and ready-to-serve it is so easy to prepare a nourishing meal with it on short notice without any bother or work.

Bishop Darlington's "Lighthouses"

THE Right Rev. James Henry Darlington, Bishop of the Harrisburg diocese of the Episcopal Church, is waging a lively war against the saloon by establishing "lighthouses" in the little towns in the coal regions of Pennsylvania. These little "lighthouses" contain from four to five rooms with a small gymnasium, shower baths, recreation and reading rooms. Bishop Darlington calls his "lighthouses" substitutes for the saloon and he has had the happiness of knowing that in many instances they serve this good purpose. The bishop has established about a dozen of these little institutions in different coal mining towns and they have been successful enough to cause many of the saloonkeepers to wish that they had never been built.

Bishop Darlington

Bishop Darlington gives much of his time to directing their work, and in the mining regions they tell inspiring stories of his spirit of self-sacrifice in carrying it forward. He is particularly eager to reach the boys in the coal mining towns whose lives, at best, can have little of wholesome, healthful enjoyment. Of the boys he is trying to help and boys in general, he says:

"Boys want light, music, games, exercise. They enjoy being clean and entertained. Go the saloon one better, I thought, or at least equal it in attractiveness, and there is the problem solved. So I planned these lighthouses, as they have been called, and began establishing them."

The bishop's "lighthouses" have been veritable beacon lights to many a boy and many a man in danger of shipwreck on the sea of life. They have been havens of hope to some of the discouraged and have given some men the impulse to "take a fresh start" and try to live better lives.

Through the flashes that followed, the blinding, cutting flashes of a big man's futile anger, Fordyce stood patient, and quite helpless. When it was over, and he was again alone, he felt sick and worn to the thin edge of endurance. The tumult and the shouting had died, for him, quite out—his captain had departed!

And yet, through those bitter moments, with their savor of defeat, he felt one thing clearly—that he could call again a dead faith from darkness, and that he could meet Marian's smile! He would need them both, God knew! since he looked to so dreary a journey on the forward way—a way that would be quite voiceless, since he was to know no hurrah from the camp—no shout to claim him victor!

And yet, as he boarded the little crosstown car leading to St. Agatha's, some voice in his heart went singing!

As he got out at the hospital entrance some one touched his arm. "This here St. Agatha's, cap'n?"

Fordyce nodded, looking down upon an old soldier with a Grand Army button in the lapel of his coat. "Yes, this is St. Agatha's."

The old man kept feeble step with him into the grounds. "I ain't never been much in hospitals, since Chancellorsville. Kep' pretty hearty, I have, to some of the boys. But I heard they took the colonel here yestiddy, and that brought me down on the double quick!"

"You mean Colonel Duplane?" queried Fordyce.

"Yes, him as run for mayor. He'd oughto been mayor, too—he'd 'a' made a good one! But the Grand Army vote couldn't carry him in—we're gettin' pretty slim as to the ranks, cap'n."

"You're the best part of any parade, yet," said Fordyce warmly. "So you know Colonel Duplane?"

The man laughed, the thin excited laugh of old age. "Most of us knows the colonel! He warn't properly from my part of the world; I was a Yank from up Vermont way and he was from south of Mason and Dixon's line, but when you've been through tophet together that don't count."

"No," said Fordyce, "it doesn't." They had entered the broad hall and were standing by the elevator.

"He'd ought to been mayor," echoed the old man. "He'd 'a' knocked spots out of a good many of them fellers in the city hall. But they got a young chap in that ain't never fought nothin' in his life! Put in by Dan Evarts, the boss. Huh! he could take a few lessons from our colonel!"

"Perhaps," said Fordyce gently, "he will yet, who knows?"

A nurse accosted them. "Colonel Duplane? Yes, he's doing nicely—merely shock, I think, but that is dangerous at his age. I'll send up and find out"—she looked hesitatingly at the old soldier—"if you can see him."

Fordyce smiled back at her. "If he is open to visitors," he said, "I would like—this gentleman to go first; he's a —nearer friend than I am."

"Well, colonel"—Fordyce, standing in the sick-room at length, strove to make his voice clear, and stopped, suddenly powerless.

The colonel stretched out a slim Southern hand. "From my heart, suh, I am glad to see you! I was bound fo' yo' house when the Car of Juggernaut rolled by, suh, and it was a most ignoble battle. I tried my best to run away!"

Fordyce drew a chair up and sat down; his eyes were a trifle misty. "To see me?" he asked gently.

"Yes, suh, to offeh my apologies fo' makin' a mistake in yo' office. I left it, I reckon, in the impulsive manneh of my race! I wish to say, suh," the colonel raised himself on one elbow, "that I believe in our city's chief executive, suh, as a gentleman and a man of honor—in spite of his modest assertion to the contrary."

Fordyce drew a long breath. "Colonel," he said, "I have sent those shares back; I've invested instead—in your stock company."

"My deah boy, my little Illinois farm and my daughteh, suh, are all I own in the world!"

"In your stock company," repeated Fordyce slowly, "in these things that stand for honor, and faith, and duty—to one's country."

The colonel smiled warmly. "Ah," he said, "there you have it, Mayor Fo'dyce. In this beloved country there are ten thousand who have not yet bowed the knee to Baal!"

The Charm of "Samantha"

Our premium was received safely, also the Almanac, for which please accept thanks. It is filled with good things, both useful and entertaining—a very welcome visitor. Samantha at Coney Island (our old friend in a new dress) has lost none of her power to cheer, brighten and enliven our winter evenings. God bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its workers.

LOVING SERVICE*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

PETER and Andrew, James and John were plain men, like hundreds of others, who spent their days, and we might almost say their nights, in fishing on the Sea of Galilee. They fished for gain. It was their business, and not a savory business, as we must know when we recall the bad odors of fishing-places and fish-markets. We do not know the names of any of the Galilean fishermen besides Peter and Andrew, James and John. And how wonderful it is that their names are known the world around—not only known, but honored. Men call them Saint Peter, Saint Andrew, Saint James, Saint John. For, from being unlettered men, they are now numbered among the best known and most read authors of the world. What could lift them from such a low to such a high estate? It can be told in five words: They were linked with Jesus. Jesus selected them to be his co-laborers in the work of preaching the Gospel. John and Andrew first became interested in the preaching of John the Baptist, and sometimes left their nets to listen to him. When they heard John speak of the grace and truth that should come by Jesus Christ, they wanted to see and know the Christ.

On the day following his baptism by John, as Jesus was passing by, John the Baptist said to Andrew and John: "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world." Then their acquaintance with Jesus began, for they followed him, and asked where he lived, and were invited by Jesus to go with him to his lodging-place. For hours they listened to the wonderful words of Jesus. Then the two men asked that they might go and bring their brothers, that they too might sit at the feet of the great Teacher. Andrew went and brought to Jesus his brother Simon (Peter), and John brought his brother James. So it was that one day, not very long after, when Jesus was walking beside the Sea of Galilee, he recognized the four men among other fishermen, and his desire went out to them that they should become fishers of men—preachers of the Gospel. When Jesus saw them there, Andrew and Simon were casting their nets into the sea; we would say they were seining. James and John were in the boat with their father Zebedee, mending their nets. Jesus, seeing the empty boat of Andrew and Simon, got into it, and asked Simon to push it out a little from the land; then Jesus used it as a pulpit, sitting down after the manner of Jewish rabbis while he preached to the crowd that gathered on the shore. After the sermon was over, Jesus told Andrew and Simon to sail their boat far out from the shore, and let down their nets to catch fish. They were two discouraged fishermen, for they told Jesus that they had toiled all night and caught nothing. But they answered, "Nevertheless at thy word we will let down the net," and they did. Immediately it was filled with more fish than they could take care of; so they called out to James and John to bring their boat and help them. They were all astonished at the draft of fishes.

It might be supposed that the four fishermen friends of Jesus had a corner in fish that day, and that great gain in money would be the result; but it was not so. They left their fish on the shore, that whosoever desired them might have them free. Jesus had offered them a better business: fishing for men with the Gospel net. "Come ye after me, and I will make you to become fishers of men." We are told that "straightway they left their nets and followed him." Those four men thus became the first four disciples (apostles) of Jesus. Jesus had already been preaching the Gospel for more than a year, with Capernaum as his center, and it was his desire to have co-laborers, that the great Gospel work should go on after he should return to his Father.

What an honor was placed upon men as Christ thus linked them to himself, making them the most famous, the best loved, the most useful men in all the world.

The first four disciples entered at once upon their activity, for they accompanied Jesus upon his preaching tour, and entered with him into the synagogue where he preached to the people and afterwards healed a demoniac. Undoubtedly they were also with Jesus when he healed all the sick who were brought to him at the door of Peter's house (Mark 1: 29-34).

The Joy of Service

"Not to enjoy life, but to employ life" is one of the best of mottoes to live by. It is equally true that after using our energies for the necessities of life, the way to be most happily employed is to do what we can for others "In His Name." Jesus is still calling disciples. His desire for co-laborers never was greater than now. The fields never were so white and so ready for the harvest as now. "The Master is come and calleth for thee." Let each one who reads put his or her own name at the beginning: "William, the Lord is come and calleth for thee." "Alice, the Lord is come and calleth for thee." He will show us plainly what he wants us to do if we will only keep our eyes and ears and hearts attent. Do not let us think any duty that may come to us small and insignificant, and on the other hand let us not be dismayed when a great opportunity opens before us. Let us keep ever in mind that we are co-laborers with Jesus. Let us be up and about our Father's business without delay. He who does his best, however little it may be, is always to be distinguished from him who does nothing.

We shall do much in the years to come,
But what have we done to-day?
We shall give out gold in a princely sum,
But what did we give to-day?
We shall lift the heart and dry the tear,
We shall plant a hope in the place of fear,
We shall speak with words of love and cheer,
But what have we done to-day?

We shall be so kind in the afterwhile,
But what have we been to-day?
We shall bring to each lonely life a smile,
But what have we brought to-day?
We shall give to truth a grander birth,
And to steadfast faith a deeper worth,
We shall feed the hungering souls of earth,
But whom have we fed to-day?

NIXON WATERMAN.

When we have once experienced the joy of loving service, all other things which are usually supposed to make life enjoyable will seem tasteless and insipid. Take the following story from George Kennan's book, Tent Life in Siberia. Mr. Kennan and a companion had gone in search of a company of missing American friends, and after a journey by dog sledge for two hundred miles over drifted snow they reached a spot where they thought they might be buried alive. The mercury had sunk to fifty degrees below zero. The feet of the dogs spotted the white snow at every step. One of the two brave explorers had sunk exhausted on his sledge. Suddenly Mr. Kennan heard a faint, long-drawn halloo across the wintry waste. It came from a "Chookchee," who had gone on in advance. As he came up, he discovered the Chookchee standing by a small black pipe projecting from a snowbank. The lost wanderers must be under it. "Thank God! Thank God!" softly said the heroic explorer, and then he shouted down the pipe, "Halloo the house!" He heard a startled voice under his feet reply: "Who's there?" Then he entered the snow cellar and seized hold of his long-lost friends. His joy was so great that he could hardly raise his hand to his lips.

But how much greater is the joy of those who seek lost souls and bring them back again to their Father! Have you ever had this joy? "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as stars forever and ever." (Dan. 12: 3.)

"When Christ gave up his life on the cross, there probably were not a hundred men and women who cared the turn of a hand for him. Might not the Saviour, in calculating the result of a life of teaching and testimony such as his, have said in the hour of his death, 'What have I gained by it?' . . . The right way for a man to live is the way Christ lived. . . . To pour out a tide of thoughts that bless men who read them; to send forth a tide of enthusiasm which tends to lift men up; to bestow a tide of affection on those who need it, and to do those things without watching to see whether the good intended comes from them or not—that is in accordance with the right conception of living. When once your eyes have been enlightened, and you have felt the power of the world to come, and have had its ideal brought down to you, you ought not to be satisfied with any other kind of living."

From an old English parsonage
Down by the sea,
There came in the twilight
A message for me.
Its quaint Saxon legend,
Deeply engraven,
Hath, as it seems to me,
Teaching from heaven.
And on through the hours
The quiet words ring
Like a low inspiration:
"Do ye nexte thynge."

Many a questioning,
Many a fear,
Many a doubt
Hath it quieted here.
Moment by moment,
Let down from heaven,
Time, opportunity,
Guidance are given.
Fear not to-morrow,
Child of the King;
Trust them with Jesus!
Do ye nexte thynge.

Author Unknown.

A Christian once truly said: "A holy life is made up of a number of small things: little words, not eloquent speeches; little deeds, not great heroic acts; the little constant sunbeams, not the lightning flash; the sweet waters that go softly, not the rushing torrent, these are the true symbols of a holy life. The avoidance of little evils, little sins, little inconsistencies, little weaknesses goes far to make up at least the negative beauty of a holy life."

How to Teach the Lesson to Children

It seems natural for children to want to help somebody, particularly to help father or mother; therefore, begin the lesson by asking them to tell what they have ever done to help in their homes. Then suppose that Jesus should some day come to visit in their homes, or they should see him walking on the street, what would they like to do to help him? Tell them that when Jesus lived in this world he asked some people to be his helpers. Here will come in the lesson story about his first four disciples. Then to make the lesson very practical, tell the children that because they cannot do things for Jesus, he has sweetly said that whatsoever we do for others because we love him, he will count as having been done for him. The Golden Text is quite too difficult for children to memorize understandingly; better substitute for it: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." (Matt. 25: 40.)

The Stuart Washington Portrait

GILBERT CHARLES STUART was born in Narragansett, Rhode Island, on December 3, 1755. His father, a Scotch Presbyterian minister, had come to this country and set up a snuff-mill, and was known as "The old snuff-grinder." When Gilbert was still a mere lad a Scotch artist, one Cosomo Alexander, took him to Scotland, where in the University of Glasgow he received some general education and special instruction in drawing. At the end of two years, however, Alexander died, and young Stuart worked his way home on a collier. Thirsting for knowledge and quick to understand what he felt to be of utmost importance in his art, namely, drawing from life, and an education, he studied the lives of great masters and Greek and Latin and paid a strong muscled blacksmith a quarter of a dollar an evening to pose for him. It is interesting to note that, ever after, the great portrait-painter attributed much of the pre-eminent quality of his modeling and the unusual strength and rotundity of his work to the many faithful studies he made of the brawny smith. In 1775 war seemed imminent in his own country, sitters were difficult to get, and he was very poor. Fearing lest the war would last many years, he embarked on board the last ship that escaped detention in Boston harbor and set out for the goal of his ambition, which was to study art with Sir Benjamin West, president of the Royal Academy in London.

We read in his delightful biography: "West was dining some friends when I called on him first, and the answer which he sent me was, that he was engaged. On being told that it was some one from America, 'Show him in,' said the great man; and after that it was easy enough." In a very few days the daring and ambitious student became domiciled in the West family and was entered in the anatomy classes of Joshua Reynolds, the drawing classes of Doctor Cruickshank, and Trumbull and Sully gave him the benefit of their criticism. Gilbert Stuart was still a young man when his brilliant career began and both fame and fortune attended him. One of his highest ambitions while he was still in England was to return to his own country and give to Americans a faithful portrait of Washington, and thus in some measure to associate his name with the name of the Father of his Country. His ambition is well justified in the sublime portrait which is the subject of our cover, and easily the greatest of the famous Stuart Washingtons. A nobler personification of wisdom, strength and goodness reposing in the majesty of a serene countenance is not to be found anywhere. Gilbert Stuart was not only the first American portrait-painter; he was a philosopher, a scholar and a gentleman. Seven hundred and fifty-four portraits of the noted men and women of his time testify to his popularity, and at his death in 1828 he bequeathed to his country the rich inheritance of his fame.

Farmers' Institutes

TEACHERS' Institutes, in which the teachers of a certain town, county or State, meet at set times to discuss the methods of their profession and to interchange ideas as to improvement, have been long and favorably known throughout the country. While we have had local, county and State Agricultural Societies time out of mind, it is only within the past decade that Farmers' Institutes have come to the front as a potent influence in the uplift of agriculture. The subjects discussed at these meetings suggest themselves at once, but it is the fact of the meetings themselves to which we wish to call attention. Institute work is now established in forty-four States. In forty-one States 5,582 institutes were held last year; of these 3,723 were one-day meetings; 1,704 two days, and 155 three days or more. There were held 15,532 sessions, at which there was an attendance of 1,904,676. The special institutes aggregated an attendance of 1,252,933, making the entire attendance at institutes of all kinds, 3,327,092. This was 383,848 more than in 1910.

In addition to the institutes, 149 movable schools were held with an attendance of 39,965. There were 62 railroad instruction trains, which covered 35,705 miles; with these trains were 740 lecturers, and the lectures were heard by 939,120 persons. In addition to this instruction and opportunities for getting acquainted, there were hundreds of farmers' picnics and sociables, all helping forward the cause of agriculture and tending to the uplift of the country's most important workers. Yes, the farmer is coming into his own, after the long waiting, for which he is not himself wholly blameless.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST E. P. TELFORD, who has been remarkably successful in England, is now revisiting this country on an evangelistic mission. Many hundreds have been converted under his ministry in Great Britain, and his labors in America two years ago were also greatly blessed.

—F. HERBERT RHODES, of the China Inland Mission, Chefoo, writes: "There never was a period in the history of China when its people more urgently needed the earnest prevailing prayers of all who love the Lord Jesus Christ, and the help and sympathy of the Western nations."

—WARREN, O., HAS just experienced the greatest religious awakening in her history. Rev. M. H. Lyon, D.D., of Wheaton, Ill., and an evangelistic party led a religious campaign. The big tabernacle, seating 4,000, was thronged with crowds every evening for five weeks. Thirteen hundred expressed a purpose to begin the Christian life.

S-M-A-S-H—
Go Roofing Prices!!

Never before have you been able to participate in a Roofing sale such as this. This opportunity came about an unusual manner. It is out of the ordinary channels of manufacturing and selling possibilities. We only have limited quantity at this slaughter price, and subject to prior sale or reservation.

Corrugated Steel Roofing
1¼ Cents Per Square Foot

Now every one knows, who knows anything about Roofing, ceiling and siding that there is nothing in all the world that can come anywhere near comparing with the wonderful qualities of steel for a covering. It many times outlasts prepared roofing, shingles or slate. It is fire-proof, snow-proof—considerably warmer in Winter and cooler in Summer. It is in every manner superior to any other roofing.

Prepared roofing cannot be leak-proof. It cannot last. It peels, cracks, warps and the elements get to it sooner or later. Slate chips, cracks and is far too expensive in transit. Shingles blow off, warp and leak and the up-keep is entirely too expensive. There are no draw-backs to Steel Roofing. It lasts year in and year out with only ordinary care. You are absolutely safe and secure from the elements. It is insurance proof, and is the only real safe and sure roofing to use.

By one of those unusual occurrences, one in a lifetime we came into possession of this lot of Roofing, comprising the weights and sizes, corrugated and crimped, which places us in a position to very materially undersell anything that we or anyone else has heretofore been in a position to offer. YOU can easily make that, and more too, if you have a back yard, or a little land and are willing to devote two hours a day to the work. The poultry business cannot be overdone. There are 91,000,000 people in the United States and there will be more next year, and those people must be fed. The growth is in the cities. Consumers are increasing twice as fast as producers. High prices have come to stay. "SIDE-LINE POULTRY KEEPING"
$1,188.05 Is the amount cleared by F. H. Dunlap of West Salisbury, N. H., in 1910 from his hens. Mr. Dunlap is a country merchant and postmaster, and does not have over two hours a day on an average to devote to his hens. The full story of his success, his methods of feeding, marketing, etc., are described in the book, "Side-Line Poultry Keeping."
$1,009.31 R. A. Richardson of Haverhill, Mass., a shoe cutter, made his hens pay him $1,009.31 in 1910, and kept working at the bench at the same time. How he did it is told in "Side-Line Poultry Keeping."

"SIDE-LINE POULTRY KEEPING"
Is the name of a new book by Edgar Warren, the popular and reliable writer upon poultry topics. It is written for the man or woman who wants to add to their income in quite a line that will not interfere with their present occupation. It is so plainly written that the person who never kept a hen, by following the instructions of the book, can make a success from the start. Tells what breeds pay and what do not. Discusses pigeon raising, fruit growing, berries and gardening in connection with poultry. Describes two simple, practical poultry houses which can be built at low cost and sold when the owner gets through with them. Tells how to hatch and brood chicks, both naturally and artificially, and describes a wonderful brooder system that can be installed at low cost. Do you know how to pick out the layers? Can you tell with your eyes shut which hens are laying and which are not? "Side-Line Poultry Keeping" will show you. It will tell you what to feed for eggs, how to get fertile eggs, how to grow green food in winter, how to make lice powder that will kill the lice as soon as it touches them, what to do in case of sickness, etc., etc. Shows you how you can get the top-notch prices for what you have to sell. Has a chapter on "Laying Down Eggs," which gives the two methods which are absolutely safe and reliable. Lay down eggs in March and April, and sell them in November and December, and make 100 per cent profit. Drawings and description of a trap-nest with which to keep individual records. Gives Mr. Dunlap's cure for White Diarrhoea. Tells how to send dressed fowls to market with empty crops without shrinkage in weight. These are but a few of the good things in the book.

God's Purposes and Love*

EVERYBODY knows Mrs. May Riley Smith's beautiful poem illustrating the truth that "God doth not afflict us willingly," but for our own good, and to work out the transcendent purposes of the universe. Let us quote its first stanza as a fit introduction to this great theme:

Sometime, when all life's lessons have been learned,
And sun and stars forevermore have set,
The things which our weak judgments here have spurned,
The things o'er which we grieved with lashes wet,
Will flash before us out of life's dark night,
As stars shine most in deeper tints of blue;
And we shall see how all God's plans are right,
And how what seemed reproof was love most true.

The modern expression of the same thought is most powerfully voiced perhaps by the greatest of the nineteenth century poets, Robert Browning. The noble Festus, watching beside his erring friend Paraclesus, cries,

God, thou art love! I build my faith on that.
Even as I watch beside my tortured friend,
Unconscious whose hot tears fall fast by him,
So doth thy right hand guide us through the world
Wherein we stumble.

And as Paracelsus dies, he confesses his error in having tried for knowledge without love. He sees that love should "precede power,"

. . . and with much power, always much more love.

David sings in Saul,

I report as a man may of God's work—all's love, yet all's law.

The apostle John, in A Death in the Desert, keeps his Scriptural character wholly, in making love the burden of what is described as his last earthly discourse. He cries:

I say this is death and the sole death,
When a man's loss comes to him from his gain,
Darkness from light, from knowledge ignorance,
And lack of love from love made manifest.

No more loving soul ever walked our earth and labored for its good than the saintly Madame Guyon. Early weaned from a life of vanity and fashion by beautiful revelations of Christ's love, she began to model her life upon his. The greatest influence for good which came to her, she says, was a brief conversation with a poor monk who joined her one day as she was walking to church with her footman.

"He spoke to me in a wonderful manner," she testifies, "of God and divine things. He said that God demanded the utmost purity and height of Christian attainment."

From that day she gave herself anew to Christ. Two years later her beauty, which had been the greatest cause of her pride, was taken from her by smallpox. Then she lost a darling child; then her property; then, for seven years, all her joy in her religion, "living," as she said, "by faith alone." Then she saw that her trials were given to purify her. She bore nobly a long imprisonment for her religion, and her joy returned. Her great experience was transcribed in sixty wonderful volumes to be an aid to Christians forevermore.

Patience*

DR. GRENFELL tells of a small fishing schooner which started for Newfoundland one winter from the port of Cadiz, Spain. She was manned with tough Newfoundland sailors, well seasoned by long battling with ocean storms, and her captain knew his business well and was afraid of nothing. They were in the very midst of the Atlantic when they were struck by a waterspout, and swept clean of mast, bowsprit, bulwarks, boats and deck-houses. The deck itself "gaped open like a sieve." Their only hope was to keep afloat until some passing vessel should pick them up, but could they do it? Gale after gale struck them. Their food was cold and wet. They were wretched and begged to give up the fight and be allowed to die, but the captain exercised his ingenuity to inspirit them and keep them at the pumps. One steamer passed them by; then a second. They were in despair. At last, when even the captain was beginning to waver, a third great liner hove in sight. If this chance were lost, they felt they could not hold out for another. They lit a huge bonfire on their deck, knowing well that it would set fire to their vessel, but knowing also that it was their only hope.

The great ship signaled, "Can you hold out till morning?" "No, we are sinking now," they signaled back. The ship at once lowered its steel lifeboat. The giant seas crushed it in an instant. Then a wooden lifeboat was let down, manned with its crew. This, too, was doubled up ere it touched the surface of the sea, and broke into a thousand fragments, while the brave sailors in it just saved their lives.

Still, the good ship would not give up. Down over its side came next a light, collapsible boat, that was "dropped from the davits on the run." This weathered the sea, and all of the perishing men on the schooner were saved.

Just such a fight for life as the schooner made; just such an effort to save as the liner made; just such odds as both met and endured and conquered, are necessary from time to time for us all in the moral world, and must be overcome there. Bear, bear, struggle, struggle, get beaten over and over again, then pick yourselves up and press forward—this is the routine and the law of life.

In all departments, patience, the most difficult of the virtues, is needed to achieve success. In the higher intellectual arts, it is especially required. Only once in hundreds of times does an artist, a musician, a writer come into reputation or produce a worthy work quickly and easily. Generally, repeated failures precede success.

Patience, in the true sense of the word, is not dull stolidity. It endures quietly and bravely, but is on the alert to seize every occasion. As it waits, it is strengthening its armor. Above all, it is fixing its faith upon the high things of God. As Professor Peabody once eloquently said: "To live in the presence of great truths, to be led by permanent ideals, this is what keeps a man patient."

The Celebration of a Centenary of Peace

TO MOST Americans the year 1812 suggests but one thing—the War of 1812. And two years ago plans were well under way to celebrate in this country with pomp and ceremony the principal battles and victories of that war. From the first the idea was unpopular, however, and a far happier suggestion has supplanted it, a suggestion that instead of celebrating the battles of a century ago, English-speaking people all over the world unite to celebrate the century of unbroken peace between America and Great Britain. Frequently since the signing of the Treaty of Ghent have we had serious disputes with England, but in every instance they have been settled with arbitration and reason, without once coming to blows.

Preliminary meetings for the purpose of appointing executive committees to carry out the details of the vast undertaking have already been held in New York and London. And many of the foremost men have declared themselves willing to devote both time and money to the supreme event of the modern world, the Jubilee of Peace between the two great English-speaking nations.

One of the features of the jubilee will be the setting up of a line of permanent artistic monuments to be placed at intervals of a hundred miles, along the 3,840 miles of unarmed frontier which separates Canada from the United States.

The Washington-Quebec Highway will be opened. The boulevard across the Canadian Peninsula to Windsor and Detroit, and from Detroit to the State line near Chicago, making an international highway 1,300 miles long, will also be dedicated. Three bridges of monumental character will be built across the Niagara River and a great international park is to be planned.

The prospective tunnel from the Canadian shore to Belle Isle, and the bridge from Belle Isle to the American shore will be opened and the building begun. These are a few of the plans which already have been approved and accepted. Besides these permanent monuments there will, of course, be innumerable pageants and parades and other popular features of the centennial celebration.

But by far the most impressive moments of all the festivities will be: first on Christmas Eve, 1914, when religious ceremonies appropriate to the celebration shall begin in the cathedral at Ghent where the signing of the treaty was celebrated one hundred years ago. The news will be flashed by wireless around the world, and celebration services in every English church of any denomination will be simultaneously held. Again, on the fourteenth of the following February, centenary of the day Congress ratified the treaty of Ghent, there will be a five-minute cessation of all work wherever the American and British flags fly, and English-speaking people everywhere will be requested to offer silent prayer and thanksgiving.

Peace societies have a vast and important work before them. Much is to be done and there is little enough time in which to prepare.

The general topic for discussion from this time forth will always include ways and means of doing our share in the supreme undertaking of nations. We should bear constantly in mind that there is nothing comparable to it in all the vast affairs of men. All who are in any way interested in the principles of the Peace movement are cordially invited to join the ranks of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Peace League. Every Peace Circle organized is a great encouragement and help to us. Organization leaflets with plans, programs and general suggestions for Peace club meetings and social evenings, together with interesting leaflets bearing upon the subject of Peace, will be sent to any address on request.

Address all communications to Secretary of CHRISTIAN HERALD Peace League, Bible House, New York City.

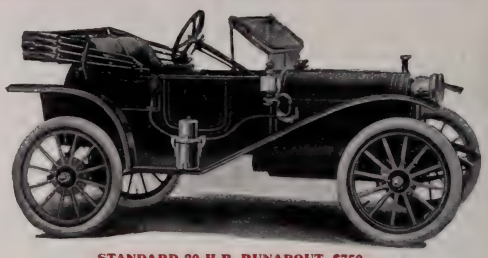
HUPMOBILE LONG STROKE "32" FIVE-PASSENGER TOURING CAR, $900

F.O.B. Detroit, including equipment of windshield, gas lamps and generator, oil lamps, tools and horn. Three speeds forward and reverse; sliding gears. Four-cylinder motor, 3¼-inch bore x 5½-inch stroke. Bosch magneto. 106-inch wheelbase. 32x3½-inch tires. Color, Standard Hupmobile Blue. Roadster, $900.



STANDARD 20 H.P. RUNABOUT, $750

F.O.B. Detroit, with same power plant that took the World-Touring car around the world. Four cylinders, 20 H.P., sliding gears, Bosch magneto. Equipped with top, windshield, gas lamps and generator, oil lamps, tools and horn. Roadster, $850. Coupe, $1100.

NEW York's eyes were opened during Show Week to the splendid "staying powers" of Hupmobile construction by the triumphant return of the World-Touring car.

The amazing achievements of this car, in its 40,000-mile trip, conferred additional distinction upon the new Hupmobile Long-Stroke "32"—first publicly shown at New York—because both are the fruits of the same skilled organization and the engineering leadership of E. A. Nelson.

Hupmobile sturdiness so strikingly exemplified in the World-Touring car, receives new and more impressive expression in the Long-Stroke "32," with its distinctive features of construction and its generous power—found heretofore only in cars costing a great deal more than $900.

Questions and Answers

H. L., New York City. A backslider, guilty of repeatedly breaking the same commandment, becomes repentant. He spends days and nights in deepest agony of repentance. Finally the Holy Spirit flooded his soul, bringing the sense of pardon and regeneration. While he still feels a deep sense of sorrow because of having committed the sin, he has an intense longing for God, and a desire to work for him. Do you think he can feel that he has a right to work for God again?

Working for God is the very best thing he can do. There is nothing in Scripture to warrant the conclusion that a backslider, who is truly repentant, and puts his sin resolutely behind him, may not expect full forgiveness. Our Father, who knows all our weakness and our temptations, is merciful and never refuses to accept the repentant sinner who comes seeking pardon in Jesus' name. Still, there is one thing the backslider must endure: the old scars of sin will remain, the memory of ingratitude cannot be effaced, and the joy of assured acceptance will be subdued by these recollections. The case of the persistent and habitual backslider, who "plays hard and fast" with God, is a far more serious one. See Heb. 6: 4-9.

J. T. P., Drakesboro, Ky. What are the other instances of a love like that of Damon and Pythias?

The most notable examples are those of Castor and Pollux, twin gods in Greek and Roman mythology, and David and Jonathan in the early history of Israel (I. Sam., chapters 14, 18, 19, 20, 23; II. Sam. 1: 17-27).

J. P. Fish, La Grangeville, N. Y. Was Jesus, up to the time of his appearance in the temple when he was twelve years old, different from other boys of his own age?

There is nothing in the New Testament to indicate that the childhood of Jesus was essentially different from that of other boys, except, of course, that he never did wrong. The stories of his arbitrary and grotesque exhibitions of miraculous power among his playmates are absolutely without foundation and are foreign to the spirit of the Gospel narrative. Even after the appearance in the temple the picture drawn of him is that of a normal, healthy, obedient boy. He "was subject" to his parents; he "increased in wisdom and stature and in favor with God and man." Doubtless from this time forward he became conscious of his divine mission.

Miss A. B., Lusk, Texas. Please tell the history of "Mother's Day," and what day has been set apart for it by the States that observe it.

Miss Anna Jarvis, 2031 North Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, founded "Mother's Day" in 1905, and will upon request furnish programs for its observance. The second Sunday in May is the regular date; a white carnation (or whatever may have been the mother's favorite flower) is worn in the buttonhole. Some have celebrated the day by dedicating playgrounds, orphanages, hospitals, libraries or other memorials to the memory of departed mothers. Special presents and loving visits are given to living mothers. Forty-three governors have asked their States to celebrate it.

Subscriber, Decorah, Ia. What are we to understand by Dan. 12: 1, and Matt. 24: 21?

Typically, "at that time" is interpreted as referring to the close of Antiochus' reign, when great troubles afflicted the Jews. In the larger sense, it is held to refer to the last stand and the destruction of Antichrist at Christ's coming. Matt. 24: 21 refers to the passage in Daniel 12 and bears the same twofold explanation.

R. C. K., Coyote, Mont. I write to ask about Matt. 20: 12-16. Why did Christ use this as a likeness of the kingdom of heaven? Is it not natural for any one who has to work to sympathize with the men who worked from early morning? Would not this be a difficult passage to explain to a labor union man in Bible study, or to a prospective convert?

In the parable of the vineyard, it is shown (1) that true Christianity is active service rendered to Christ; (2) that such service should be regarded as a privilege, instead of an infliction, even if unrewarded; (3) that rewards are not of merit, but of pure grace, even though they may be attached to faithful work; (4) that the Lord is free to "do what he will with his own"; yet his rewards and recognitions are stamped with equity, since in his sight, zeal, fidelity and self-sacrifice may more than counterbalance lack of long service; (5) that those who, through various causes, may come in late are none the less welcome, and finally (6) that the foremost in the world's estimation may have in heaven's ranks a lower place than that of some far humbler worker. Referring to the latter part of your question, we do not see why it could not be explained satisfactorily to ordinary labor. If a worker serving a whole day receives the full allowance agreed upon, he surely has no fault to find on his own account. The contract with him has been scrupulously kept. If the employer, taking pity on the necessity of those who were unable to come early, paid them, too, the full wages, such an act of pure liberality should not be construed as a reflection on the other workmen. Why should we begrudge another his good fortune, when we ourselves have been treated with absolute fairness?

Mrs. W. A. G., Iron Mountain, Mich. In our Sunday School lesson there was some dispute as to who Simeon and Anna were. Were they related to Jesus?

Simeon was a devout Jew, inspired by the Holy Ghost. In one of the Apochryphal Gospels —that of Nicodemus—he is called a high priest. The Jews mention a rabban named Simon, who was of the family of David, and who became president of the Sanhedrin about A.D. 13, but whether he was identical with the Simeon mentioned by Luke cannot be definitely stated. Anna was an aged widow of the tribe of Asher, who, during her widowhood, attended daily the morning and evening services. It is nowhere stated that she was related either to Mary or Joseph.

H. C. C., Ola, Idaho. From the Gospel narrative we learn that Jesus was born shortly before the death of Herod the Great. Herod died in the year of Rome 750-751, which corresponds to the year which we now designate as 4 B.C. to 3 B.C. Hence, Jesus was born at least as early as 4 B.C. Please explain.

Herod the Great died in B.C. 4, according to the accepted chronology. It has long been known that the accepted chronology (with respect to the Nativity) was misdated through an error in calculation (said to have originated with a writer of the early church, named Exiguus) by which the date of the Nativity was put four years later than the time at which it actually took place. The best scholars to-day agree that our Lord's age at the time of his baptism (the fifteenth year of Tiberius), was thirty years, which would fix the date of the Nativity in B.C. 3, counting backwards. If, as some writers assume, he was fully thirty years, this would fix the date of his birth some time in B.C. 4. This is as near as any of the scholars have been able to determine.

B. F. L., Eufaula, Wash. 1. What class of Christians is referred to in Rev. 20: 4, 5? 2. What is meant by talent in Matt. 25: 14, 15? 3. Please explain Rom. 10: 15.

1. The twelve apostles and the saints in general are referred to. Judgment was assigned to them. Though in one sense they are to stand before the judgment seat, yet in another sense "they do not come into judgment, but have already passed from death to life." They are the righteous and the martyrs, and those who have suffered for Christ's sake and who now share in the first resurrection. 2. The talents referred to in the parable are the various gifts and endowments, natural or spiritual, original or acquired, which they are expected to use to the best advantage in the Master's service and for which use he will hold them accountable. While the proportion of gifts or talents may differ in each, the same fidelity and zeal are required of all, and their rewards are in equitable proportion. The talents may be education, business ability or the inheritance of wealth, or they may be purely spiritual; but all can be made available for the highest purposes when rightly used, each in its own special channel of service. 3. The "sending" to which Paul refers is clearly a missionary one, as the sending of an evangelist or a teacher or preacher about whose spiritual qualifications no question need be raised. God gives the message, the messenger is ready and it is the church's part to equip him and send him forth on his mission. Paul himself held it to be a divine mission (Acts 26: 16-18).

W. E., Vallejo, Calif. Two Sundays ago, in our Bible class, it was stated that people could not write during Moses' time, and that Moses did not write the five books attributed to Moses. Can you give us any light on the subject?

Both assertions were wide of the mark. There is no doubt that long before the Exodus, there was a learned class in Egypt whose wisdom is still found partially preserved in hieroglyphs and other inscriptions and who had laws and historic records that were preserved in tablets. As to the authorship of the five books (the Pentateuch), volumes have been written on both sides of the question, but the orthodox view is, and always has been, that they were largely the work of Moses, or written under his direction.

L. T. H., Dumbarton. Please suggest seven reasons for attending Sunday School, which could be printed on a card used for inviting new pupils and following up absentees.

I. You need to know what the Bible teaches; the Sunday School gives you the best help in finding out. II. Other people who ought to go will stay away if you do. III. You need Christ; the Sunday School helps you to find him. IV. You need the help of Christian friends, of Christian songs and prayers; you find them at Sunday School. V. The Sunday School needs you; every new pupil and worker makes the school more enthusiastic and successful. VI. Patriotism and civic pride should take you to Sunday School; your community and the whole nation are helped beyond the power of reckoning by these schools, where the Word of God is taught, and clean, kind living urged. VII. World citizenship calls you to the Sunday School; it is a big, world-wide movement for righteousness, and if you want to make your life count for the most you should keep in touch with the movement and help it along.

Iowa's Champion Corn-Raisers and Champion Bread-Maker

ON FEBRUARY 1, ten Iowa schoolboys, each a champion cornraiser in his own county, visited President Taft and Secretary of Agriculture Wilson in Washington, D. C. They were accompanied by Miss Lois Edmonds, eleven years old, Iowa's champion bread-maker. These children were sent to Washington by the Congressional delegation of Iowa, the boys that they might visit the country's agricultural headquarters and Miss Edmonds that she might bake a loaf of bread for President Taft. In spite of her youth, Miss Edmonds wrested the honor of the championship of Iowa in the bread-baking field from 1,400 other contestants. The boys were accompanied by Professor F. C. Bishop, of Ames Agricultural College, and Miss Edmonds by her mother and sister. Miss Edmonds is the little girl in white at the left side of the accompanying photograph.

The Church of St. Paul in Modern Corinth

The Ruins of Ancient Corinth, Looking West

In the Footsteps of St. Paul

New Corinth, Old Corinth and St. Paul's Corinth

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

Founder and President, Christian Endeavor

WHEN one reaches the railway station at Corinth, he is yet miles from the site of the city which St. Paul knew, for New Corinth has moved down from the high plateau under the shadow of its great natural citadel, and planted itself on the shores of the gulf which bears its name. It is worth while to linger here for a few minutes, for it gives us a modern view of one of the larger Greek towns, and at the same time shows us some of the everyday sights which must have been very familiar to the great apostle. Doubtless, during his long residence in the city on the hill, he often wandered to the shore and gazed out over the blue waters of the gulf to the majestic mountains on the farther shore.

Eliminate the railway and the railway station, the telegraph poles and wires; clear away the dismal, monotonous, flat-roofed houses and the dirty streets and lanes, and substitute for them orange and olive groves and vineyards, which very likely occupied the site of modern Corinth, and you have the scene that Paul saw. In all its great natural features of mountain and plain and gulf, and in the character of its vegetation; in the fleecy clouds above, in the play of the glorious eastern sunlight on the farther hills and the glint of the lustrous moon on the rippling waters, the site of Corinth has not changed during these nineteen hundred years.

The first impression that one gets of New Corinth is certainly not a happy one, particularly if one arrives on a dark, rainy day in winter, or on a glaring summer noon, with the dust blowing in clouds down the dirty streets. Your baggage is seized by a ragged porter, and with it you are bundled into a dilapidated barouche, which has probably done duty for many years in Athens or some such ambitious city, until it was sent to Corinth to finish its career. The driver whips up his raw-boned horses, and rattles you over the horrible roads as though his life depended on reaching your hotel in three minutes instead of five. The hostelry you find is modest in everything but price; but it is clean, the one sine qua non which must always be insisted on in Greece, and the fare at the table is very good, though scarcely worth the dollar which is charged for a dinner. But these are trifles, for one goes to Corinth not to secure all the luxuries of the season, but to transport himself into the past, and to renew his faith at the ancient altars.

Yet the present is very insistent in obtruding itself upon you as you step out of your hotel door. In noting the little, even trivial, things of everyday life in modern Corinth, you feel that at the same time you are getting nearer to the past, for in the "unchanging East," much more than in ever-changing America, the common sights and sounds are much the same, yesterday and to-day, if not forever. As you step out of the hotel door, you see a country woman, in glaring colors, driving a small flock of turkeys up and down the street, with the help of a long wand and a small boy, similarly armed. Occasionally a buyer appears, and after many futile attempts, accompanied by much indignant gobbling on the part of the turkeys, one of the big birds is caught and has to submit to be ignominiously felt by the prospective buyer, who wishes thus to judge of his age and tenderness. After several such captures have been made, and much preliminary haggling, a bargain is struck, the turkey is carried off, and the woman, the boy, and the long wands collect the diminished flock and seek another buyer. Doubtless just such homely little comedies have been enacted in the streets of Corinth, old and new, for the last three thousand years. If my hypercritical reader should say that turkeys were introduced from America, and could not have been seen in Corinth in St. Paul's time, I would reply that geese and ducks and chickens were doubtless known, and that they were treated in much the same way.

A Greek Woman Spinning as She Walks

The fish of the sea, as well as the fowls of the air, are the same as in the olden days, and are captured in the same primitive manner. The shores of the gulf are but a scant three minutes' walk from our hotel, and there we see exactly the scene that Paul, as he went to the shore, must have often viewed—fishermen hauling the net. In a great clumsy boat they have rowed out half way across the gulf, which here is a mile or more wide, and have thrown overboard their long net, paying it out a little at a time until its great circle can enclose a multitude of fishes, if they are only there to be caught. Then the fishermen row back to the shore in a wide sweep, and jumping to the land, a dozen brawny men and as many boys begin to haul in the net, using the end of a cord which goes around their shoulders and which they deftly twist around the ropes attached to the net, thus being able to use the strength of their shoulders as well as their hands in hauling the heavy meshes through the water. So far out was the net cast that to haul it in is a matter of two or three hours, and the fishermen console themselves by singing and grunting and munching slices torn from great loaves of hard bread which are piled up on the shore for their use.

At last the net nears the shore, and the excitement of "the lottery of the sea" brings numerous loafers from the town and soldiers of the little garrison to see what luck awaits the fishermen. The fish are all entangled at the very end of the net, and when this is seen coming out of the water, barelegged boys and men jump in and throw upon the shore perhaps a bushel of little fish like sardines, and a very few larger ones, as a reward for their half day of toil. Uncounted generations of fishermen have caught the same kind of fish in the same way, at the same spot, on the Gulf of Corinth, and as we watch them we are transported into the past as we could be in no other way by these very modern descendants of Peter and Andrew.

The town of Corinth need detain us but a very short time. It is "hideously

NEW MEN IN NOTABLE PLACES

Princeton's New Head

AFTER the lapse of a year and a half since the resignation of President Woodrow Wilson, who then became Governor of New Jersey, Princeton University has elected to its presidency Rev. John Grier Hibben. The Princeton Alumni Weekly gives the following sketch of the new official:

"Professor Hibben comes to the presidency in his fifty-second year remarkably equipped for the high office which he is to fill. There are special reasons why the incoming president should be a member of the faculty who commands the high respect of his colleagues, and who possesses an intimate knowledge of the problems now before the university. President Hibben fulfils this important requirement to an extraordinary degree. Tactful yet firm, a stanch defender of convictions but without partizanship, he is thoroughly alive to the importance of carrying on the time-honored traditions of Princeton in their full vigor, and he is in active sympathy with the educational standards of our course of study, the preceptorial teaching and the development of the graduate college. An honor graduate of the administration of that educator of educators, Dr. McCosh, his twenty years of service as a Princeton teacher have broadened his knowledge of and intensified his devotion to the Princeton standards of scholarship and manhood.

"Professor Hibben's growing fame as a scholar is recognized in philosophical circles on both sides of the Atlantic. Lately president of the American Philosophical Association, the author of several well-known books, he is now the editor-in-chief of a series of philosophical works to which the most eminent thinkers of Great Britain and America are contributors. His public lectures for the last two years have aroused a new enthusiasm for the study of philosophy in Princeton.

"During the temporary absence of President Wilson in 1906, Professor Hibben was the natural selection of the trustees to preside at commencement and confer the degrees as acting president."

In the course of a speech at his inaugural dinner, President Hibben said:

"As I interpret the messages which have come to me from Princeton men, I am deeply impressed with the fact that they expect me, above and before everything else, to conserve the old Princeton traditions. This responsibility I gladly accept, and to it I pledge my constant and loyal effort. In this connection I wish it very distinctly understood how I use this word 'conserve.' I use the phrase 'conservation of Princeton traditions' in its philosophical sense. Conservation in this sense signifies progress without loss of essential values. It does not mean standing still, but it means going forward.

"I feel, also, that it is incumbent upon me, as far as it within me lies, to conserve the democratic spirit of Princeton, and by that I mean the spirit which judges a man among his fellow men always upon his own merit and never upon the consideration of any adventitious circumstances of birth or of wealth. I believe that this spirit is here in Princeton to-day, and it has been here from the beginning.

"Finally, a word in relation to the Princeton traditions of religion. It will be my duty and my privilege, both in season and out of season, to maintain and set forward all of the influences in our academic life which make for the true spirit of religion. Princeton has always stood, and I trust always will stand, for the Christian religion interpreted in a broad and tolerant sense. We welcome men of all denominations to Princeton, and we wish it distinctly understood that Princeton, as an institution, is pledged to a simple but firm belief in the God of our fathers, who founded this place in faith and in love."

The New Premier of France

M. RAYMOND POINCARÉ, the new French premier, is a leading Paris lawyer and a member of the French Academy. The new premier was born at Bar-le-Duc in 1860, and began his political career as a deputy in 1887. At thirty-two he became minister of public instruction, and he has also been finance minister. He now becomes foreign minister, an office he has twice declined.

The European press is unanimous in its verdict that M. Poincaré heads one of the strongest ministries since the third republic was proclaimed by Gambetta. Poincaré has long been renowned as a stylist. His essays have been compared for charm with those of Montaigne. His eloquence in the chamber became, almost from the day of his maiden speech there, the model upon which French oratory forms itself. His magnetism reminds the Débats of Victor Hugo as his brilliance suggests Gambetta to the Figaro. He springs from a family in which a genius appears in each generation. His election to the French Academy was as great an event for letters, asserts the Echo de Paris, as was that of Rostand.

Haiti's New Minister

THE long outstanding dispute between Haiti and Santo Domingo is about to receive the attention of the authorities in Washington, who are anxious to settle this potential quarrel. Haiti has recently sent to Washington as her minister to the United States Mr. Solon Menos, who is authorized to open negotiations for the settlement of the exact location of the boundary line between the two republics that occupy the island that is variously known by the name of each. Mr. Menos has been president of the legislative society, secretary of state, secretary of commerce, and minister of justice in his own country. He is considered a keen thinker and competent jurist. Through all Haiti's vicissitudes he has adhered consistently to the progressive party.

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF ST. PAUL

modern," as the archæologist would say. The houses are square boxes of one or two stories, with flat roofs, sometimes whitewashed or pink-washed or blue-washed, but more often in the poorer parts of the town of the color of the original mud with which they were daubed. A little park, filled with pepper-trees and pines, relieves the center of the village of something of its forlorn appearance, while an ambitious Greek church stands amid beautiful trees and shrubs, and is appropriately called the "Church of St. Paul."

All these modest attractions do not keep us long, and we soon set off for Old Corinth, three miles away, the veritable city of St. Paul and of Gallio, of Priscilla and Aquila, of Gaius and Crispus and Chloe and the other worthies with whom the Bible narrative has made us so familiar. The road for a time follows the shore, and then rises by two or three zigzags to the plateau above.

The view from the top is superb. To the north and west stretches the blue Gulf of Corinth, with the great mountains towering beyond it—Parnassus and even Olympus itself, and many another famed in classic story. To the east are other mountains scarcely less mighty, between which the silver waters of the Ægean Sea wind their tortuous way. On one side was Læcheon, the western port of Corinth when it was the greatest commercial city of the world; on the other, a little further off, was Cenchreæ, her eastern port, which connected her with the world of Asia. And look more closely. By straining our eyes we can see lordly Athens and its many hills, the marbles of the Parthenon shining on the sunlit Acropolis.

Truly it is one of the most enchanting views in this world, and when we think how much of the world's history has been enacted within our sight, as we stand upon this summit, how many armies of many nations have marched and countermarched upon the plain below, how many times this hill itself, always the military key to Greece, has been stormed and captured by hostile troops, our emotions are stirred as they could be moved in few other spots. Paul, during his long residence in Corinth, must often have climbed this great hill, which always cast its morning shadow over the city. But what a different sight met his eyes in some respects from that which we see! The mountains and valleys, the seas on either hand, the vineyards and the pine trees were much the same, but the habitations of man, how different!

Then, one of the world's great emporiums lay at his feet. Now, a few mud hovels and some half-excavated ruins are all that remind us of Corinth's former glory. Then, hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of people occupied the fertile plains and plied their trades in the busy cities within his view. Now, a few beggarly thousands eke out a scanty living in these former abodes of wealth and luxury. Then, great walls and fortifications connected the metropolis with its two ports that commanded the commerce of the Eastern and Western worlds. Now, scarcely a vestige of these walls can be seen, and the patient ox drags the slow plow over the site of former luxuriant villas and busy thoroughfares.

But while in imagination we have been looking from the summit of Corinth's Acropolis, first through Paul's eyes and then through our own, in reality our rickety carriage has been bumping over the unmended highway, which grows worse as we approach the site of the ancient city. As the road becomes more and more full of stones and cradle holes, our driver whips up his horses with redoubled vigor that he may make a dashing sensation and astonish the few natives of ancient Corinth. Through two or three wretched streets, where each house looks a little more dilapidated than its neighbor, we drive, until at last our jehu pulls up under a huge plane tree in the middle of the village.

On one side is a coffee-house, with a Greek priest and a village peasant talking together in a neighborly way. On the other, a beer and wine house, where swarms of flies dispute with two or three loafers for the possession of the liquid refreshments. Further up and down the road from the big plane tree are a score or two of poor hovels built of stone, daubed with mud. Frowsy women gossip with each other at the doors of their huts, which are often windowless. Black-eyed children dabble in the mud, for the rainy season has begun. Long-legged goats munch thistles and newspapers by the roadside as contentedly as in the Shantytown of New York, and hens, geese, ducks and pigs make free with the grass-grown roadway of ancient Corinth. This squalid village, which harbors two hundred souls, perhaps, all told, wretched even for a modern Greek village, is the successor of the city which at one time was the proudest metropolis of antiquity. Thucydides writes that this was the place through which all ingress and egress took place between Northern and Southern Greece.

Famous beyond comparison was this city in song and story, in legend and authentic history. We are told that "the construction of the ship Argo is assigned by mythology to modern Corinth. The first Greek triremes—the first Greek sea fights—are connected with her history. Neptune was her god. Her colonies were spread over distant coasts in the East and West, and her ships came from every sea to her harbors. Thus she became the common resort and the universal market of the Greeks." To be sure, before Paul's day this city of the Greeks had been utterly destroyed and left desolate for many years by the Romans. But by the Romans it had been again rebuilt under Julius Cæsar, who realized its importance from the military and commercial standpoint. Its days of prosperity and splendor returned to it, and it was this Greek city under Roman rule that Paul knew. Here he wrought with his tentmaker's needle. Here he taught in the synagogue of the Jews. Here he established a church which caused him much anxiety as well as gave him comfort and consolation through many of its members. Here he dictated his greatest epistles. To this church were written the greatest of Christian classics, saving always the Master's own words—the classics that relate to Love and the Future Life, as recorded in the thirteenth and fifteenth chapters of his first letter to this church.

MAURETANIAS OF THE SKY

ON THE landing dock of the Transatlantic Aero Company, men in uniform are scurrying about in well-ordered confusion. Blocks and cables groan and creak under the testers' hands. A hydro-aeroplane that has come skimming over New York Bay rises from the water, alighting on the dock like a gull come to rest. From it emerge the customs officers. Near by a wireless is spluttering, and presently the operator turns over his shoulder, crying:

"I've got the Zeppelin XX. She's off Sandy Hook!"

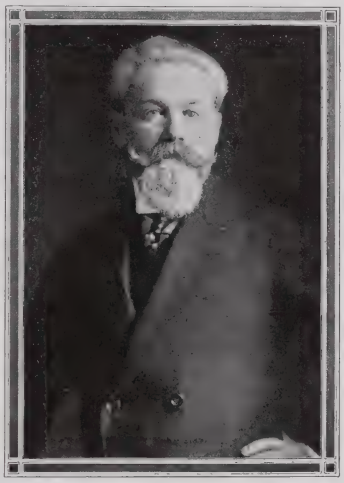
A tall man, evidently a German, hurries to him.

"When will she land?" he asks.

"In about a quarter hour," replies the operator. "Her operator just flashed she's only fifteen miles away."

Instantly the tall German darts away, issuing orders on all sides of him, with the confusion and tumult growing as the minutes pass. The Zeppelin XX, three days out of Bremen, is about to dock at New York. Already the enclosure at the other end of the company's grounds is swarming with people waiting the landing of those aboard the sky liner. A squadron of taxicabs waits ready to bear the passengers to New York and Brooklyn. The minutes pass and then a dark smudge is seen sliding up the sky far out to sea. Nearer and nearer it comes, finally revealing the lines of the huge dirigible. Flying perhaps two hundred feet above the water, it passes the Narrows. A few seconds later, wheeling ponderously, it floats motionless over the dock and then descending slowly alights with surprising ease in a network of stout ropes—like a toy balloon dropping into the acrobat's net at the circus. Scurrying hither and thither the dockmen make her fast, the customs officers are lifted aboard, and in due time the work of unloading passengers and cargo begins.



Dr. Gans

Now do not smile at this vision of the future. That is what all Europe did when Count Zeppelin first dreamed his dream of the dirigible. To-day they are still wondering over feats achieved last year by his dirigible, the Schwaben. In one hundred and forty trips (many from one end of Germany to the other) it made 12,670 miles, carrying 2,500 passengers. Also the Schwaben, the Parseval, and the Deutschland have built up a very profitable passenger-carrying business.

And now it is seriously proposed not only to attempt a complete flight across the Atlantic, but if it is successful to establish a regular fleet of coastwise air liners and later a trans-atlantic service. And the dreams of the promoters are very alluring.

The present Zeppelin and Parseval models have aboard sleeping cabins, dining saloons, kitchens and decks for the accommodation of a score of passengers. And it is pointed out that the discomforts of seasickness will be avoided by the wonderfully calm sensation of gliding through the air. Surprising views may be obtained from the deck of a dirigible, and the sensation of overtaking, hovering over and passing the Lusitania would indeed be novel. German engineers have declared that the construction of a dirigible capable of carrying three hundred persons presents no engineering difficulties. Experiments at Dusseldorf indicate that a craft can be built capable of remaining in the air a week. Moreover, the comparative safety of the dirigible was demonstrated by a recent trip of the Schwaben. Between Berlin and Gotha it encountered a terrific storm, yet rode through it on even keel and landed the passengers according to schedule.

The Suchard at Rest in Her Great Shed

Meantime much interest attaches to the coming venture of Dr. Paul F. Gans, a German scientist who will attempt to prove the practicability of the scheme by flying from the eastern to the western side of the Atlantic. To-day he is at Teneriffe in the Canary Islands, hard at work directing the assembling of the craft in which he will make the trip. It is called the Suchard, and has been pronounced perfect by the German engineers who planned its construction. Dr. Gans hopes to leave the Canary Islands by the second week in March. His destination will be the Barbadoes in the West Indies.

Offhand it may appear a strange place to start from—the Canary Islands. But Dr. Gans chose that point because it enables him to make his route, that of the northeast tradewind. This blows steadily across the Atlantic from the Canary Islands, and in the first four months of the year storms are practically unknown in its path. Regarding this wind, Professor Willis C. Moore, chief of the United States Weather Bureau, is reported to have said that if Dr. Gans is able to keep the Suchard in the air for the necessary length of time, nothing can prevent it from arriving at the destination.

Consequently a great deal may be said to hinge on this expedition of the daring German aeronaut. All the scientific world as well as the men who plan air travels over the seas will be watching it. His trip, however, will be the first of a long series of experiments that will be conducted this year to show the practicability of the dirigible as a vehicle of aero-transportation. Beside the new balloons that they're turning out at the Zeppelin works in Germany, the Suchard is only a toy.

The running of a dirigible demands a thorough knowledge of its parts. In Germany a long period of apprenticeship is demanded before a man becomes the pilot of a dirigible. This period is considerably longer than is required for the man who would be a master handler of the aeroplane. The captain of a dirigible must know exactly the speed of his craft and its maneuvering ability. The sense of her responsiveness to the vertical steering apparatus and the maximum of carrying capacity must be as an open book. To guide a dirigible through atmospheric disturbances of more or less violence requires exceptional skill.

Take the Suchard, for instance. Dr. Gans will be confronted by thirty different kinds of navigating instruments. There are special instruments for detecting and measuring the electricity in the air, for measuring the velocity of the wind, the speed of the craft, the temperature in the balloon, and a remarkable device that will warn the crew at night if the Suchard descends to within fifty feet of the water.

The development of the dirigible is coincident with the life of Zeppelin of Germany. Count Zeppelin is seventy-three years old—an old man watching the fulfilment of a dream half a century old. Zeppelin's is one of the most picturesque romances of invention. Backed by his private fortune, and, when that went, by great sums subscribed by the German people and their emperor, Zeppelin worked away on the dirigible. One day, lord of the air, he swept over cities and towns; the next day he lay in the hospital, his monster balloon strewn on the trees of a forest.

When a boy of eighteen, he began to dream of flying. Not until 1898, however, at sixty years of age, did he make the first flight in the model now known universally as the Zeppelin. Accidents and setbacks began to hound him, and at seventy he saw the dark finger of fate pointing him out to the world—a failure. Frantically he worked over his models, and then came a day in April three years ago, when, with the last of his money gone and the life within him going, he astounded the world by flying 175 miles from Lake Constance toward Munich, often faster than forty miles an hour.

Now, those who had smiled and tapped their foreheads significantly when Zeppelin's name was mentioned hurried to the aid of the dogged old count. One month later, Zeppelin left the shed at Lake Constance, calmly announcing that he would remain in the air twenty-four hours. The first hours found him soaring over the towns and villages of South Germany. Six hours passed. He flew on. Twelve hours. He was still aloft. It was unbelievable. In the newspaper offices of Europe and America they were rushing the exploit into print. Twenty-four hours passed. Zeppelin flew on. Then thirty-six hours, and the great balloon was headed back toward Lake Constance. Finally at the fortieth hour it settled gently on the waves and was towed ashore. Zeppelin's dream had been fulfilled.

Dr. Gans will not have been the first to attempt an ocean crossing in a dirigible. Walter Wellman tried it in 1910, sailing from Atlantic City and being rescued by a passing steamship somewhere off Bermuda, and Arthur Vanniman, his mate, is now preparing to leave Atlantic City in a dirigible of his own. However, airship building has progressed so rapidly of late that it may be that one or another of these rival dirigibles will succeed in making the passage.

Commendations from North and South

I wish to thank you for the book, Samantha at Coney Island, and the Almanac, both of which I like very much and thoroughly appreciate. I have been a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years and feel that I cannot live without its beautiful Christian influence. It is to me next to my Bible; an added lamp for my feet and guide to my heart.
Rutland, Vt. MRS. SARAH S. ALDRICH.

The Bible has been received as a premium, and I must say I am more than pleased with it. It was better than I expected, and I was well paid for my trouble. The same kind of a Bible here in a bookstore would have cost me $6 to $8. One of the new subscribers (Mr. Dunlap) said to me, "The Christian Herald Almanac is worth the money itself."

Saving Souls from Death

TEXT: "He which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death. James 5: 20

THOSE are stirring words—startling words. Are there souls in danger of death? There are. Where? About us everywhere. Every soul that has erred from the truth is in the way of death, and unless converted will perish forever. The darkness of eternal death will soon close in upon him. It may be in ten years; it may be in one year, it may be in one month, it may be in one week, it may be in one day. It may be that before the rising of to-morrow morning's sun some erring soul that is to-day within our reach to convert and save may have passed beyond our reach and gone into eternal despair and doom. But if we arise, and by the power God gives us convert that soul from the error of his way, we shall have saved a soul from death.

The Death of the Soul

It is a great privilege to save a human life. One day I was sitting on the deck of a sailboat. The boom swung round suddenly and swept another young man into the water. I leaned over and caught him by the coat collar and held him until he was pulled into the boat. I was glad at the thought that I had perhaps saved a fellow-man from death. But what is that to saving a soul from death? The life we save must be given up after all. The young man to whom I referred accidentally shot himself in a few years. One soul saved for eternity is worth a million lives saved for ten, fifteen, twenty, or fifty years. And how much more fearful is that from which the soul is saved! Natural death is in itself not such a dreadful thing. If one is prepared to die, he can say as Mr. Moody did, as he closed his eyes on this world, "Is this death? This is not bad. This is bliss. This is glorious." But the death of the soul—there is something unspeakably awful about that. When the body dies, there is still hope beyond. But when the soul finally dies, there is no hope beyond. There is nothing but eternal midnight blackness.

I look upon the dead form of the Christian and ask, "For how long is he dead?" Not for long. For a very brief space indeed when we come to measure things as God does, not by years but by ages. Indeed, as far as the spirit is concerned he is not dead at all. The inner real man departed to be with Christ the moment it left the body. And the body itself will soon be raised again in new beauty, mighty, spiritual, glorious like to Christ's own glorious resurrection body. But I look upon the dead soul and say, "For how long is this?" And then comes wailing back from the vast deeps of eternity the answer, "Forever." There is something unutterably, inexpressibly horrible in the death of the soul. Death is not mere non-existence any more than life is mere existence. This is plain from Paul's striking description of one who "is dead while she liveth." (I. Tim. 5: 6.) "Life" is true existence, right existence, holy existence, happy existence, God-like and God-possessed existence. Death is untrue existence, wrong existence, unholy existence, wretched existence, devil-like and devil-possessed existence, the debasement and ignominy and shame and agony and ruin of existence. And all this, if one is not saved, for all eternity.

The Value of a Soul

I. Now, mark you, the one who converteth the sinner from the error of his way has saved a soul from all this, has saved a soul from death eternal. The other night you sat beside a man and pointed out to him from the Bible the error of his way. You showed him that he was a lost sinner and that Jesus Christ was a divine Saviour, and the awfulness of his sin in rejecting that glorious Son of God. You got him to forsake his sin and his rejection of Jesus Christ as his Saviour and his Lord. Do you know what you did? You saved a soul from death. It did not seem such a great thing when you went home, but it was a glorious thing, a thing that made high heaven ring with shouts of joy. You saved a soul from death. If you had gone out and seen a building on fire and had rushed through the flames and smoke and saved six men, women and children from burning to death, you would not have accomplished anything like as great a good as when you saved that soul. Oh that God might give us to see on the one hand the value of the soul and on the other hand the infinite awfulness of that from which it is saved when it is converted! Men and women make two or three efforts to convert and save some one and then if they fail they give it up. But if we realized the value of a soul and the importance of saving it, if we made one hundred efforts and failed and then one more and then succeeded we would feel repaid a thousand times for all our failures. It is worth the effort of a lifetime to save one soul, but if we are faithful we shall each of us save many times one.

Before I go to the next part of my subject let me repeat my text once more, and may God burn it into your hearts: "He which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death."

II. Who can save souls? We come now to the question, "Who can convert sinners and thus save souls?" To this I answer, Every one of us. It is God, of course, in the last analysis who converts sinners and saves souls, but the text makes it plain that he does this glorious work through us. "Brethren, if any of you do err from the truth, and one convert him; let him know, that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins." There are some who would sit down and wait until God saw fit to convert the sinner. The farmer might as well sit down and wait until God saw fit to give a harvest. Of course, it is God who gives the harvest. Without God all our plowing and harrowing and sowing would be in vain; but God gives no harvest unless we plow and cultivate and sow. And God saves no souls without us. The number of unsaved men on the earth to-day who will be saved depends entirely upon the faithfulness of those who are already saved.

Our Duty as Soul-Winners

It depends upon your faithfulness and upon my faithfulness. That is an overwhelming thought, but it is true—so ponder it for a while. The number of unsaved men, women and children to-day who are brought to Christ and saved from hell depends in a measure upon every child of God in this audience this morning. It depends upon every student in yonder institute. It depends upon every Christian sitting in these chairs and pews. The day has gone by when any intelligent student of the Bible thinks that the work of converting men from the error of their ways and so saving souls from death belongs only to ministers. James was not writing to ministers, but just to ordinary Christians, when he said: "Brethren, if any of you do err from the truth, and one convert him"—the word translated "one" is precisely the same as the word translated "any" in the same verse. A literal translation would be, "If any one among you do err from the truth, and any one convert him."

Converting sinners is a work that is open to all Christians and a responsibility God has laid upon all Christians. If any Christian goes up before God without having converted others, he will be held to account for it. Let me put this question to each one of you, "Have you converted any one lately from the error of his ways—converted him to Christ?" If not, then up and at it at once.

III. How can we convert sinners from the error of their way and so save them? We come now to another immensely important but easily answered question. How can we convert sinners from the error of their ways?

1. First of all, by prayer. The Holy Spirit says through the apostle John, "If any man see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death, he shall ask, and He shall give him life for them that sin not unto death." Prayer avails more than any other thing for the conversion of sinners. Sinners have been converted without any very direct definite effort of others on their behalf. I doubt if any sinner was ever converted without some very definite and direct praying. No one ever made any very direct and definite and intelligent effort for my conversion, but there was some very direct and definite praying, and that is why I am here this morning preaching the Gospel and not in hell bewailing my lost estate.

There is tremendous converting power in earnest and persistent prayer. I don't mean, of course, the mere going into God's presence and asking him to convert some given individual and then forgetting all about it. I mean the setting of your face with the determination that some given person shall be converted and saved and then never letting God go until that man is converted. God gave me soon after my own conversion one of the unlikeliest men to pray for, and pray I did every day for perhaps fifteen years. For a long time there was no sign of the conversion of that man, but he came at last. The labor was long, but when a man-child was born into God's family there was joy in heaven. That man now is in heaven, but God used him to convert others before he went. Brothers and sisters, ask God to give you men and women to pray for. Take them definitely upon your heart and give God no rest day or night until they are converted and saved. Then take up some others.

How We May Reach and Win Souls

2. In the next place, we can convert others from the error of their ways and so save them by taking them to the place where they will hear the Word of God preached in purity and in power. There are such places. Get people to them. Get the people there who go nowhere. Get the people there who now go where the Word of God is not preached. I am sorry to say there are many supposedly orthodox churches where the Word of God is not preached. Get the ministers of such churches straightened out if you can—and oftentimes you can by prayer and effort—but if you cannot, get people away from such churches and take them to churches where they will be fed and converted. The one who gets another to go to the place where he is converted and saved has just as important a part in the salvation of that person as the man who preaches the sermon or speaks the word whereby he is converted. A woman, herself quite recently converted, came to me with great joy after a meeting, and said, speaking of a man who had been converted that afternoon, "I invited that man." Well might she rejoice. She had brought him under the influence of the truth whereby he was saved. Her part was fully as important as mine.

3. We can convert sinners from the error of their ways and so save their souls from death by ourselves giving them the Word of God in the power of the Spirit. You may not be able to preach, but you can do personal work. You can acquaint yourself with a few (or it may be many) passages in the Bible that God especially blesses in the salvation of men and you can give them to others and look to the Holy Spirit to carry them home and give them power, to the conviction and conversion of those to whom you give them. The Word of God is the instrument God has appointed for the conversion of men from the error of their way. It is the Sword of the Spirit and he is ready to give every child of God skill in using it. You may not be much at argument, but you do not need to argue; just give the unsaved man God's Word and leave it to work in his soul.

The Power of God's Word

To a scoffing young man passing out of a meeting one night I gave Isa. 57: 21—"There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." The next night he was on his knees seeking pardon. Fill your mind with the Word of God and give it out to others, looking to the Holy Spirit to bless it, praying earnestly to God that it may be blessed.

If you can't help another yourself, you can take him to some one else more gifted, and thus he may be converted and saved and you will have a part in the glorious work. But do it yourself whenever you can. If you will only have faith in God's willingness and power to use even you, you will be used even beyond your most sanguine hopes. There were few unlikelier men ever started out in this work than D. L. Moody, but he did his best by night and day; and how wonderfully God blessed him! It is a wonderful privilege to convert sinners and save their souls. Try your hand at it. Don't give it up if you fail a hundred times. Keep firing the Word of God at men, asking and expecting God to direct your aim, and some glad day you will bring down your game. How well I remember how I stumbled along in my first attempts! But what a wonderful day it was when for the first time I definitely succeeded in converting a sinner! I shall never forget that day.

4. We can convert sinners and so save their souls by giving our testimony to what the Lord has done for us. I have increasing faith in the power and importance of Christian testimony. Christ sent the apostles out to be witnesses, and their testimony won others. I have lately been reading about the great Irish revival of 1859. It was largely by the testimony of those already converted that the revival spread and thousands were saved. If I have got a good thing and tell others of it, they will want it too. I once mentioned incidentally, by way of illustration in a sermon, a nerve and brain food I had taken and its good results. I don't know how many came up to me after the meeting and wanted to know the name of it. Tell men what Jesus Christ has done for your soul—tell it in the meeting—tell it on the street—tell it in the shop, tell it wherever you get a chance. I am persuaded that we do not testify enough.

5. There is another way in which we can convert sinners from the error of their way and so save souls from death, i. e., by the use of tracts and books. If you can't talk much yourself, you can give others a good tract and get them to read it. Some who will not read a tract will read a book. Get a few colportage books such as Probable Sons, Sowing and Reaping, The Way to God, and pass them around. Get one to read them and then another. Almost any one is willing to read Moody's Sermons nowadays. They will do it out of mere curiosity. Pray God to bless them.

These are some of the ways to save souls. There may be others, but these are enough to begin with. Now begin. Begin to-day, and keep it up as long as you live. Oh, it is wonderful to save a soul from death. Won't it be glorious to meet some one in heaven and have him take us by the hand and say, "I owe it to you that I am here"? Oh, to have just one say that! But we can have many. To have a man say, "That invitation of yours to go to the Chicago Avenue Church, February 25, 1912, that is what led to my salvation." "That text of Scripture you spoke to me—that saved my soul." "That tract you handed me—that led me to Christ." That will be glorious! One day a young man came up to me in the aisle and said, "I am in Christian work, but you led me to Christ." The man was a perfect stranger to me. I didn't recognize him. "Oh," he said, "I didn't speak with you, but I heard you speak. I made no sign at all but I was hit. I went away miserable. But I yielded at last." How I rejoiced! But that was nothing to the joy we shall have in eternity when we come to realize what a soul is worth and what death means. How we shall shout for joy over every soul we have saved from death!

Oh, let that text sink into your soul to-day and begin to act upon it. "He which converteth a sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death." Let us up and at it. Let us use all the strength we have in doing it. Let us burn ourselves out in this glorious work.

The Life That Sings

BY EUGENE THWING

I WISH I could sing for you, daddy; I just wish I could sing for you, the way Florence sings for her father. Wouldn't it be nice when you come home so tired at night? Don't you wish I could sing, daddy dear?"

"I think you sing beautifully, little daughter. I'm sure Florence can sing no more sweetly than you do for me."

"Oh, daddy! You don't mean it, really and truly. You know I can't sing a bit like Florence. I—"

"Just a minute, my little song-bird. Last night I came home very tired and not very cheerful. As I opened the door, the first thing I heard was a sweet voice saying, 'Don't cry, buddy, sister'll fix it.' After supper, the kitchen door chanced to be open for a moment, and I overheard the same sweet voice saying, 'I'm sorry your head aches, Annie; I'll do the dishes for you.' A little later, when grandma couldn't find her glasses, I heard, through the door of the sitting room, 'Let's make believe I'm your glasses, grandma; what would you like to read?' and then you read to her as long as she wanted. It was just like a little song-bird flitting from tree to tree with a song for everybody, and the song was so sweet that it set my own heart singing with joy and thankfulness. Yes, little daughter, you do sing for your tired daddy, and he wouldn't exchange his song-bird for anything in all the world."

THE life that is full of music, the life that is always singing, the life that vibrates in pleasant harmony at every touch, is one of the most potent influences for blessing in the world. Some lives are in constant discord. It seems that they always are jangling and out of time. Every touch, by word, or act, or look, brings back a harsh sound which makes the sensitive feelings cringe. All that these poor lives need is to be brought into tune with the great underlying harmony of the universe. They must give up fighting against everybody and everything and yield themselves obediently to the great Master Musician who gives each human string its right place in the wonderful harp upon which he plays his divine symphony of life.

There are musical lives which constantly yield the most perfect melody, even though there may be no ability for instrumental or vocal performance. The greatest musicians are not the ones who draw the magic bow across the strings of the violin, or exhibit marvelous technique on the piano. The musicians who make the world glad are those who go through life singing as "daddy's" little daughter sang; who touch with fingers of sympathy and love the tender chords in the sad or tired lives around them and make them vibrate in pleasant harmonies.

SOMETIMES it is easy to sing; the song flows unbidden from a natural exuberance and love of melody. But when a man or a woman is looking a hard world in the face, carrying a burden, enduring the strain, fighting the stern battle of life, then the real blessing, the real balm for tired, anxious, troubled hearts is the song that rises from the deep places in the soul and bursts in conscious praise to the One who could say to the storm, "Peace, be still."

Music in the storm, laughter when the clouds are black, a song in the night are worth more than tinkling melodies in the sunshine days of life. When the strain grows severe and the cords seem almost breaking, a song of gladness, however forced at the beginning, will quickly bring relief and a new hope and power. Anger, fear, sorrow yield to the influence of song even when it comes from another singer. They are instantly banished if the angry or fearful one begins himself to sing. Worry cannot abide, and doubt and pessimism flee from the joyous presence of song.

I have known a man to be harassed beyond endurance and driven by perplexities, anxieties, and threatenings to the point of defeat, and when there seemed no way of escape and nothing else possible to be done he has suddenly burst into song, or lifted up his soul from the depths in trustful praise to his God, and in an instant, he declares, everything has looked brighter, more simple, more certain of the right outcome. "I am poor and sorrowful," wailed the Psalmist, and in the very next verse, pulling himself together, he exclaimed, "I will praise the name of the Lord with a song."

MORE than likely some other soul groping in the dark may be waiting to hear your song and to be touched by your cheer. You may wake the music in his heart by the vibrations of your own, as when the bow is drawn across the strings of a 'cello near a closed piano the corresponding strings in the silent instrument will answer with the same notes. Frank De Witt Talmage has told in graphic manner an incident of the dark days in the Civil War:

> After the two opposing armies had been watching each other for months upon the opposite banks of the Potomac, there came a night of strange song which will always be remembered by those who were there. The moon was shining brightly. The surface of the river was reflecting the lights, not only of the campfires of the two armies, but also the lights which came from above. The only sound to be heard was the going forth of the relief guards and the calls of the sentries, "All's well along the Potomac!" While the stillness of death seemed to prevail, a Northern soldier was writing to his mother. As he wrote, he became very homesick for the sight of the old farm. He softly began to sing the words which John Howard Payne wrote when he was a helpless, sick, friendless, lonely exile. He sang the words which all Americans have sung a hundred times. As the homesick boy sang, the men in the next tent took up the refrain. Then the song went from company to company, regiment to regiment, brigade to brigade, until it leaped across the river and the Confederate army sang in the chorus as well as the Federal army. The warhounds which had been growling in rage and showing their white teeth and tugging at their chains turned and went into their kennels and lay down to listen to the music of "Home, Sweet Home."

When the night of trouble is darkest, when the dogs of fear or worry snarl in your path, when the bats of evil omen flap their wings before your eyes and you seem ready to stumble and go down, lift up your head and sing. Let your song burst forth full and free from a trustful heart if it can, but sing even if the effort to do so be supreme and the song be voiceless. Home, sweet home, is just over yonder, and it is a place of peace and music. "Singing and making melody in your heart" will suffice to bring a thrilling response of music from the skies into your soul. You may say truly, perhaps, that "all thy waves and thy billows are gone over me," but be glad that you can add, immediately, "Yet the Lord will command his loving kindness in the daytime, and in the night his song shall be with me."

SLEEP, LITTLE LADY, SLEEP

*By A. Judson Hanna

SLEEP, little lady; sleep is best
And sweet for tired baby eyes.
Sleep, little lady; take thy rest,
And dream not of a time to rise.

Rest to the weary hands is meet,
So take thy rest, dear child, my friend.
Sleep to the tired eyes is sweet;
Sleep, little sister, to the end.

Here are the things she counted best—
This ragged doll, some ribbon bands,
These flowers her baby hands caressed,
Now faded, like those baby hands.

This was her garden; this is where
She left her pail with the spade athwart;
Her fingers tore that daisy there;
Ah! they have torn my heart apart!

Without, the trees weep, e'en; the rain
Falls on the grass her feet have pressed.
Within, the heart-drops of my pain
Fall for the absent little guest.

* These verses were written by Mr. Hanna in memory of his niece, Marie Annabel Hanna, who died September 14, 1911. She was a great-granddaughter of Dr. Adoniram Judson, the "Apostle to Burma," and Emily Frances Chubbuck, who wrote many stories and poems under the pen-name "Fanny Forester."

The Matterhorn

AMID the vast and appalling grandeur of the Alps,

A solemn sea whose billows wide around
Stand motionless, to awful silence bound,

the mighty knob of the Matterhorn rises supreme, for King of the Alps is he! If it cannot be claimed for the Matterhorn that it is the highest mountain peak in Europe, it undeniably is the most beautiful, the most mysterious, and the most beloved, dominating, as it does, one of the sublimest panoramas of the world. In the days when the simple mountain folk—innkeepers, goatherds, hunters, Alpine guides, and solitary priests, shut away from the world and easily believing in giants and fairies—were practically the only people living under its spell, the haughty old Titan towering above them became a terrible monster of many moods; and more legends, hero tales, old songs, and superstitions are woven about it than can be easily reckoned. But the true story of the first conquest of the Matterhorn surpasses all the rest, and is one of the most impressive tales in the history of mountaineering.

Up to 1860, the year of the first attempt and failure to climb the Matterhorn, the old Monarch of the Alps had a prestige of invincibility. No one had dared undertake to scale a mountain so rocky, and so deeply covered with ice frozen to the smoothness of a coat of varnish and bidding defiance to the climber's ax. But on July 14, 1865, a small group consisting of four Englishmen and two Swiss guides, led on by Lord Francis Douglas, a distinguished member of the Alpine Club of London, made successfully the perilous ascent. With courage almost superhuman and hardships unbelievable these brave pioneers planted the little blue flag of conquest upon the icy pinnacle of the most forbidding mountain peak in Switzerland, where no man had ever stood before. Victory won by dint of such violent efforts was heart-breaking, and the glory to the victors was short-lived; for, in descending, one of the party lost his footing and fell, dragging with him on the guide rope five of his companions. It was all over in a second, and the mangled bodies of the conquerors were picked up thirteen thousand feet below the pinnacle they had so bravely scaled. Whymper and one of the guides were not tied to the rope, so they escaped the fall; but their lives ever after were overshadowed by the dreadful tragedy. To-day the ascent of the Matterhorn is not uncommon; there are many steps hewn in the ice along the trail, and ropes hang in difficult crevasses to assist the zealous climber.

The Dynamite Conspiracy Arrests

IN a single day (February 14) the dragnet set by the Federal authorities for the dynamite conspirators caught forty-one suspects in its meshes. Arrests were made simultaneously in thirteen States: New York, Michigan, Illinois, Colorado, Missouri, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, Minnesota, Louisiana and Massachusetts. Several of the men in custody are officials of the International Association of Bridge and Structural Ironworkers, others are "business agents" or members of local unions, and all, it is claimed, were more or less actively identified with the nation-wide dynamite conspiracy which found expression in the numerous explosions of the last six years in different parts of the country. At least a dozen more arrests are looked for in the near future. Fourteen of those indicted are required to furnish bail bonds of $10,000 each and a majority of the others bonds of $5,000 apiece—the aggregate being $340,000. Specific charges are made in the indictments that the accused have conspired to violate the statutes forbidding the carrying of explosives on passenger trains and forty-seven instances of such violations are cited, although the actual part taken by the defendants is not stated. In each violation the names of Ortie McManigal, the brothers McNamara, and Herbert S. Hockin appear as chief participants. Fourteen indictments charge overt acts of conspiracy and fourteen others charge unconsummated acts. Practically the entire official staff of the Bridge and Structural Ironworkers is in custody, including President Frank M. Ryan, First Vice President John T. Butler, Second Vice President Herbert S. Hockin, the whole executive board and a score of "business agents."

This extraordinary wholesale capture of men who are accused of having conspired to destroy, by dynamite or nitroglycerin, the property of employers of non-union labor, is an event which, viewed in the proper light, should be regarded with universal approval. There cannot be the slightest suggestion of any capitalistic influence in the course the government is pursuing, and the wisest policy would be for labor unions throughout the country to stand aloof and let the law take its course. This is a good time for labor to steer clear of demagogues who would befog the issue and place the workingmen in a false attitude, as they attempted to do in the McNamara case. Our government, in its efforts to get at all the facts and to administer simple justice, is acting for the benefit of the whole American people and not of any class, and it is entitled to the fullest confidence and support in the present investigation.

The International Inquiry on High Prices

A RECENT message to Congress from the President contained the recommendation for an appropriation not exceeding $20,000 to defray part of the expense of an international conference for the purpose of preparing plans for an international inquiry into "the high cost of living, its extent, causes, effects, and possible remedies." The sum asked for is certainly very modest, but in that simple recommendation are vast possibilities of weal to the human race. It indicates that the United States is awake to the chief problems of the present day.

Mr. Asquith, upon assuming the premiership of Great Britain, bravely declared: "We are engaged in an implacable warfare against poverty." Mr. Lloyd-George's fight, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, for economic reforms has attracted world-wide notice, and the outcome of the passing of his industrial insurance bill is awaited eagerly. During the recent agitation incident to the reopening of Parliament, he has been declaring that soon both England and Germany will set themselves to the task of diminishing the "horrible burden of taxation for armaments." President Taft does not think that the time has come when the United States should begin to economize on its army and navy expenses, but is urging that the nation take its place in the ranks of those who are trying to relieve the world-wide burden of poverty. He asks that we help to discover the reasons and to remove the causes "for high prices that have so distressed the people of the world." He states that "the numerous investigations on this subject, official or otherwise, already made in various countries (such as Austria, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, the Netherlands and the United States) have themselves demonstrated the need of further study of world-wide scope."

The true humanitarian, the true democratic spirit is spreading irresistibly over the nations of the world. The problems of human want and human suffering are forcing themselves upon the attention of statesmen and scholars as well as upon philanthropists and preachers. It is to be hoped that Congress will readily accept this suggestion from the White House, and take this first step, though it is a short one, in the direction of official, international relief from the oppressive economic conditions of modern life.

A Miscarriage of Justice

NOTHING has happened in recent years to startle the public into such anxiety about our nation's courts of justice as the now notorious Brandt case in New York. Brandt is accused by Mortimer L. Schiff, whose valet he was, of burglary and assault. There are in the case many mysteries still unsolved. But the public knows that a young man has been in prison five years, serving a sentence of thirty years, or what practically amounts to a sentence of imprisonment for life; it knows that, whatever may have induced him to confess, the crime which he confessed could not be construed as being the crime for which he was sentenced; it knows that the detective who procured the evidence establishing a previous criminal record has acknowledged he knew the record to be false; it knows that the lawyer for the accusing witness wrote as follows to the police inspector under whose authority the false record was prepared:

> My idea is, of course, to be able to present to Judge Rosalsky a record which, taken in connection with the character of the defendant's crime, will require the imposition of a long sentence.

It is told that at the time of the trial the judge, the complaining witness and his lawyer met the police inspector and another man in secret conference; it knows that there is doubt whether the judge who pronounced sentence had any right at all to try the case; it knows that the governor, after refusing pardon or commutation of sentence, directed a judge to review the case who was later found to be unable, according to the law, to act in that capacity; it knows, or is almost sure, the sentence imposed was out of all proportion to the crime committed; it knows, bewilderingly, that the prisoner is very poor, and that the man accusing him is very rich.

Naturally, the public is eager to know still more. There is no doubt that the revelation of this amazing network of error and injustice will help to bring about a reformation which shall make the courts safe and sane and fair. One of the lawyers, himself friendly to Brandt, in the sparring for a new trial, made the naive statement that, academically, if the judge had no right to sentence Brandt, then the five years' imprisonment has not actually taken place; that if there was no legal sentence there has been no actual punishment. But the young man's life has been hurt with a kind of harm no possible efforts at reparation can undo. The five years are terribly real to him, even if the difficult phrases of lawyers can make them unreal to the courts. The detective who presented the false evidence declared that his conscience had distressed him until he was compelled to confess. Well it might. Are there other prisoners hidden away in jails who are there because public officials, men who are seeing the sun and swinging free limbs, have lied? The time has come for a rigorous and thorough searching of the methods of the courts.

"Obey" in the Marriage Service

NO ONE who begins to read the letters upon the marriage service which are presented in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will fail to finish them. It is astonishing to see how interesting these bright writers have made them, how varied their views are, how ably each supports her own side and how sure she is that she is right. As to the question of dropping the word "obey" from the marriage service, the "ayes" have it by nearly three to one. But set opposite to this is the eloquent plea made by other correspondents, that the venerable and sacred Episcopal service, upon which those of other evangelical churches are generally founded, should be left intact, with all of its stately and beautiful phrases unimpaired, even if one of them may savor of anachronism. The matter may seem to some readers to be trifling; and yet, as you read these comments from thoughtful and keen-witted women, you realize that the age-old rule,

> Man to command and woman to obey, has somehow fallen into desuetude, and that the new order involves for every household:

> Two heads in council, two beside the hearth,
> Two in the tangled business of the world.

But it is no "new woman" who is thus sharing equally the headship of the home. Long centuries ago the model woman was pictured in the good old Book as clothed with strength and honor; as opening her mouth with wisdom; as praised by her husband, and having her name blazoned forth "in the gates" in full publicity.

Danger Line in Church Secularization

OUR recent observations on "Secularizing the Church" have evoked comment and criticism in many quarters. One of the letters received this week calls attention to the announcement of a drama to be enacted during two days in February in a church in northern New York, to be followed on the second evening by a concert, concluding with a dance. Another church in the same town gave a charity concert in the church building, followed by refreshments and a dance in the parish house. The writer of this particular letter (which is a type of other communications of the same class) naturally asks: "Is it to be wondered at that thinking people are amazed, when invited to seek eternal life, with the examples of such doings before them?" It is beyond question that not a few but many churches, in their intense desire to get good audiences, are stepping across the danger line. However far we may go in a liberal interpretation of Christian character and conduct, there is nothing that can be set forth in justification of grafting the frivolities of the world upon the spiritual life of the church. On the contrary, such a course, by grieving and alienating the Holy Spirit, must ultimately destroy the influence of the church which yields to it. It will become like the backsliding church of Sardis, of which it was written: "I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest—and thou art dead." This is the fate that confronts those churches that take the world into partnership, and by so doing pave the way for their own spiritual decline.

Lawrence Strikers' Children Fed

ONE hundred and fifty children, sons and daughters of the strikers at Lawrence, were brought to New York City, February 10, to be kept at the homes of the friends of labor till the strike should have been settled. The children were brought under the auspices of several of the larger labor and semi-political organizations. The object of the carrying out of this novel plan was to lighten the burden of living for the strikers and to excite outside sympathy and support for them in prolonging the fight. It was expected that the train would reach New York in time for a parade and public meeting at Union Square, but the terribly cold weather delayed the arrival till after dark. There was a great crowd of sympathizers and friends to take the children to their homes, the crowd growing very large by the addition of the curious who were attracted by the flags, banners, and shouts of the enthusiastic, as well as by the band of children of poverty. The first thing on the program was to take the little ones to the Labor Temple, where they were treated to a splendid meal, of which they partook heartily and long. Then the children were taken to the homes of the kind ones who had agreed to entertain them. Three or four times as many persons offered to take the children as there were children to be apportioned. Those who took the children were, as a rule, poor, and had large families of their own. They said they would snuggle up and make space, and divide their last crust with the children of brother workmen. The children of Lawrence who remained in New York more than a week would be compelled to go to school, likely to the public schools. The transfer of the children of strikers from one city to another, a move never before attempted in a labor dispute in this country, may in the present instance be undertaken on a scale which will make it unique in the labor annals of the world. If the present plans are carried out, no less than one thousand children will be brought to New York, and it is possible that others may be sent to Boston and other cities. It is to be hoped that before many days the sane leaders among the employers and employed may have come to some agreement honorable to all, that the little ones thus scattered may be returned to their homes and schools, and that an era of mutual profit and happiness may come to Lawrence. The beautiful charity of the poor in entertaining the little children of poverty merits the reward promised by the Master:

And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward. (Matt. 10:42)

Lepers Prevent Ship's Landing

BY a telegram from San Juan, Porto Rico, it was learned that the British sloop Success, with seven lepers among the thirty-three persons aboard her, was not permitted by the port authorities to land her passengers at the harbor of Humacao. For more than a month the little craft has been buffeted about in the Caribbean Sea by wind and wave and the stern word of health officials, who denied permission to the master to land the persons aboard because of the condition of seven of them. Signals of distress were flying when the Success entered Humacao harbor and communicated the desire of the master to land his passengers because of the unseaworthy condition of the vessel. "No landing" was the verdict that fell on the ears of captain and crew. It was learned from the captain that the Success had put out from St. Kitts, in the Windward Islands, more than a month ago, and had first tried to land the passengers at a port in Haiti, but the officials there were not inclined to allow persons to come ashore from an infected vessel. Then the Success proceeded to Santo Domingo, but met the same fate there, and sailed toward Porto Rico. In a civilization so merciful as ours there ought to have been an easy landing place carefully arranged under quarantine for the leper ship. It was an injustice to the healthy whose chances for contagion were multiplied. Many, and some calling themselves Christians, are very shy of the moral lepers. They are afraid that men and women who have led bad lives, even if they are sorry and want to reform, will soil or taint them. They have not learned the first lesson in the school of Christ—that of love for the weak and the sinful. Like these modern Pharisees were the Jews who bitterly condemned Christ for having anything to do with the morally unclean.

They said unto his disciples, Why eateth your master with publicans and sinners? (Matt. 9:11.)

Testing Ships' Cables

THE cable is so important to the government ship or merchant vessel that the breaking of a steel thread may mean the loss of millions of dollars or hundreds of lives; so there is an apparatus by which these anchor cables are tested. The cable is laid in a sort of long trough, one end being fastened to an enormous steel hawser, which is passed around a revolving drum, the other attached to a hydraulic ram. The machinery is worked from an adjoining building, no one being allowed in the cable shed while the testing is in progress. If a chain does break under the terrific strain to which it is subjected it simply smashes everything near it, and may bring the whole roof down. The operator in the next room has before him what seems to be an ordinary pair of scales, but the small weights which he places upon it represent as many tons to pull upon the cable as they actually weigh pounds. While the weights are added a loud creaking and groaning is heard through the thick partition as the seventy-eight-foot length of cable, the amount tested at one time, stretches under the enormous strain. A new cable stretches about two inches, an old one a good deal more. The ordinary cable of steel two and one-half inches in diameter is subjected to a pull of over eighty tons. If an anchor is necessary for the ship, it is much more so for the soul. Life's voyage has fierce storms and dangerous rocks, and the one who has no anchor will be shipwrecked. If it is important for the ship to have a sure steel cable to the anchor that will hold, it is still more necessary to have a cable strong and sure that will hold the soul. This grip on God and the future life is referred to by the apostle:

Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the vail. (Heb. 6:19.)

Tipping Declared Illegal

TIPPING was declared unlawful and illegal by Judge Theodore Brentano in Chicago at a recent term of court. Partners in a corporation which bought the "tip concession" from hotels and cafés were in the Circuit Court for the second time within a few months, quarreling over a division of the profits of the business. For the second time they heard themselves called violators of the law. They supplied hotels and cafés with attendants whose uniforms contained no pockets and all gratuities were turned in to the promoters. The simple tipping business is bad enough even when porters, waiters and employees get the money. If the men are not paid enough wages it is a base imposition to compel the public through sheer sympathy to make the deficiency good. If they get fair wages the imposition on the public is great in unjustly appealing for charity. In any event the tip is a bribe for better service than the other customer receives. But the tipping trust is diabolical in first imposing on the public, and then plucking the employees. The tipping trust has reached the limit of insolence and imposition and is likely to put an end to the senseless and unjust habit. The decision of the court against the tipping trust is expressed in the prayer of the Psalmist:

O deliver me from the deceitful and unjust man. (Ps. 43:1.)

Hogs in a City

ROCHESTER, New York, was recently overrun with hogs during the night, and the New York Central employees effected a roundup, following the wreck of a stock train near Hague Street, when sixteen carloads of porkers, numbering several thousand, were released. Fewer than two hundred of the animals were killed or crippled and the rest roamed about the city, scores of them invading the back porches of houses in the vicinity of the wreck, while others got as far as the main streets of the city and ran squealing in an effort to avoid street cars and automobiles. The wreck was caused by the failure of one of the cars to take a switch. There are human hogs who have gotten loose and are found by the thousands in all the cities. They fight the herd away that they may have all the corn; they crowd the rest out of the trough that they may have all of the swill. They rush and sneak in at the head instead of taking their place in the line at the elevated, subway, bank or post office window. They rudely jostle men and women to get past them in entering the car or conveyance, and then try to spread themselves over two seats, and will let an old or sick man or woman stand up. They want all of the sidewalk or road. They want all there is in every trade and job, and will never let any one else have anything which they can seize upon to satisfy their base appetite. The swinish instinct in some is so strongly developed that their faces look like porkers. They seem almost to be possessed of the evil spirit that entered the herd of swine in olden time.

And when they were come out, they went into the herd of swine; and behold, the whole herd of swine ran violently down a steep place into the sea, and perished in the waters. (Matt. 8:32.)

Champion Butter Cow

THE world's record for butter production in a single year, long held by Colanthia, a Wisconsin Holstein cow, has been broken by Clothilde II., an Eastern cow of the same breed. The new champion has just completed her year's test, and according to the official figures produced in 365 days 1,277 pounds of butter from 25,000 pounds of milk. This is an average of 106 pounds of butter each month in the year. This new record appears at a time when the price of butter is soaring sky-high, to fifty cents with the promise of sixty in the near future. Some claim that a decreased production of the article has inflated the price; others deny that there is a shortage in the supply. Butter, which is a luxury in many nations, is about a necessity in our own. The poorest of the poor cannot afford it; the average American will have it at a high or low price. The Housekeeper's Union has called for a boycott on butter to compel a lower and reasonable figure. There is this reference to the use of butter as food:

And Abraham took butter, and milk, and the calf which he had dressed, and set it before them; and he stood by them under the tree, and they did eat. (Gen 18:8.)

Leading American Women Give Their Views Concerning the Time-Honored Pledge in the Marriage Service

IN RESPONSE to a letter addressed on January 20 by the Associate Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to a number of representative women, the interesting replies published below have been received. The letter was as follows:

You have doubtless read of the incident which recently took place at a wedding in England, where the Archbishop of Canterbury was the officiating clergyman in the marriage of an aristocratic couple, and where the bride, in her repetition of the service, was silent when she should have uttered the word "obey." The question has been raised as to whether this omission on her part marred the ceremony and made it illegal. The incident has attracted attention on two continents, and is now discussed almost everywhere.

Will you kindly let me know in a brief note whether you consider the "obey" an essential part of the marriage service?

SHOULD THE BRIDE PLEDGE OBEDIENCE, or SHOULD BOTH SIDES EQUALLY PLEDGE IT, or SHOULD THE WORD BE DROPPED ALTOGETHER?

Elizabeth Jordan

Jeannette L. Gilder

In actual human existence and in the marriage relation there is only the question of mutual service, fidelity to the bond, and continual affection never intermitted. I suppose that until the end of time the womanly woman will go on promising to obey and putting her own interpretation on the fulfilment of the promise. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

There were women among those who were questioned on the subject who preferred not to place themselves on record. The majority were prompt and cordial in their courteous acknowledgment of the importance and timeliness of the topic, and the various opinions so candidly expressed will interest men and women alike. Fifteen of the twenty-seven women whose letters we print are in favor of dropping the venerable word "obey" from the marriage ceremony. Seven are positively certain that it should be retained. Others declare with emphasis that what is binding on the bride should be equally binding on the bridegroom.

Among the women whose strong and earnest words are published in the letters below we have those beyond fourscore and those in the flower of their youth. The symposium is itself representative of the best we have to show, North and South, in the womanhood of this great country:

"Obey" in the Marriage Service Is "an Anachronism," Writes the Distinguished President of Sorosis

IN MY opinion the use of the word "obey" in the marriage service of to-day is an anachronism. In the era when a maiden counted it no disrespect to be seized by her strong wooer, slung across his saddle-bow and carried off bodily to the man of holy orders who should unite them in marriage, the woman, though trembling secretly, exulting in her captor's prowess, the word "obey" on her lips fitted well into the primitive scheme of wedlock.

"When knighthood was in flower," and fair maidens sat in their towers embroidering, with their own beautiful hair for thread, silken scarfs each for her own knight, and watching from their windows to see him approach on his prancing steed, wifely obedience seemed fitting. Her knight was bold and strong; she was timid and dependent.

You may seek in vain for this violet-maiden to-day. Even in king's palaces you will not discover her. She has emerged from her sheltered place. She is no longer helpless and dependent. She works side by side with lover and husband, and calls him "comrade"—not "lord and master."

Amelia E. Barr

This change in the attitude of men and women toward each other renders the presence of the word "obey" in their marriage contract an absurdity little short of ridiculous. It belongs in the far past, with the time when it was not seemly for woman to speak in the churches, and when even her head-covering and her manner of dressing her hair were matters for men to decide!

I believe the average sensible, chivalrous man of to-day would rather promise to obey his chosen bride, whom his love exalts to the stars for queenliness, goodness and wisdom, and beside whom the greater his manliness, the more unworthy he feels himself, than to have her descend from the heights where he has set her, to promise obedience to him!

In their conversation about it before marriage, it is a theme for badinage and jest and derisive laughter. It is never taken seriously.

Let us have an honest marriage service into which "there shall in no wise enter anything that worketh abomination, or maketh a lie."

What the Brilliant Author of Many Books Thinks of the Pledge of Obedience

I THINK the word "obey" should be omitted from the marriage service. Obedience, as I understand it, is something we exact from one beneath us in rank or intelligence. A wife should be her husband's equal in rank, no matter whether she is his inferior or superior in intelligence. The relation should be one of mutual sympathy, affection and helpfulness, without the slightest tyranny on either side.

To promise blind obedience to another's will is taking a very big leap into the dark. The promise "to obey" is a relic of medieval times. The Western world is too advanced to wish for women of the type of Chaucer's patient Griselda. It is also exceedingly wrong, in my opinion, to repeat the vow "to obey" lightly and then interpret the words according to personal convenience. I think the feminine mind prefers to rely upon masculine intellect and judgment when they inspire confidence, respect and admiration. In such cases to demand obedience would be entirely unnecessary.

Don't Drop "Obey," but Interpret It Rightly, Writes Mrs. M. A. Chamberlain

I SHOULD not drop the word "obey" from the marriage service, but I should, as, in actual fact, I believe most wives do, interpret it to mean, not the Latin parere (obey) as a child obeys a parent, but the audire, translated in Cæsar "obey," but really meaning to hear or to listen. Obedience, in the sense of hearing, or listening with open mind to the voice of her husband, cannot diminish the dignity of wifehood, but would, I am confident, tend, on the contrary, to develop a similar form of "obedience" on the part of the husband.

Most American Women Would Retain "Obey," Writes the Editor of Woman's Home Companion

I CAN see no reason for changing any part of the marriage service. I look upon marriage as a sacrament, rather than as a contract, and I doubt if the happiness of any one would be in any way affected by any change in the wording of the rite which has become dear and familiar through tradition. Possibly the English lady referred to in your letter may have believed it necessary to take precautions; but I think few American women would hesitate to repeat the good old service, without any change whatever. All Women Speak the Word "Obey" With Mental Reservation, Writes Eleanor Hoyt Brainerd, Popular Author

WHY retain in the marriage service a phrase which any intelligent woman must speak with mental reservation, and which no fair-minded man could want her to accept in any other way?

It seems as absurd to promise obedience in marrying as in entering into any other partnership.

A Twentieth Century Interpretation by Mrs. C. DeF. Burrell

HAVING for over forty years heard a marriage ceremony in which the word "obey" does not appear, I cannot consider such marriages illegal, nor the word an essential part of the ceremony.

Nevertheless, I confess to a liking for the old word, believing as I do that there is no hint of insubordination. It may be that mine is a twentieth century interpretation, but I feel quite confident that Solomon's perfect woman would say the same.

Sentiment and High Ideals Not to Be Set Aside, Writes Grace Duffield Goodwin

IF THE word "obey" is "necessary to the legality" of a marriage, then all those marriages not solemnized according to the rituals using the word are illegal. Not the form employed, but the act itself in the presence of the proper authority makes a marriage legal. The word "obey" is found in the heart of one of the oldest and most venerated of marriage forms—that of the Church of England—and is retained, it seems to me, for purely sentimental reasons. The better understanding and comradeship between men and women to-day has relegated the idea in its old interpretation to the background. No man demands its literal fulfilment, and no woman expects to render it.

This is my personal observation of the matter. But I am old-fashioned enough to think that a properly constituted home must have a head, and, in disputed matters, a court of last resort. To my mind, this is the husband's place. In grave and important matters, I have always held it the husband's right to cast the deciding vote. In the last analysis, he is responsible, as the laws stand at present, for his wife and children. In Massachusetts, he must be responsible for minor crimes and illegal acts committed by her. He is responsible for his children and stepchildren. So long as a woman is willing to have her husband made the legally responsible member, she should be willing to yield to his judgment sufficiently to render his position stable.

In all small matters, there seems to me no question of obedience; in mutual counsel the best good of all should be decided. Therefore, in answer to your three questions, my opinion is: First—"Should the bride pledge obedience?" Only with the interpretation I have offered, which has been previously understood by her husband.

Second—"Should both sides equally pledge it?" Certainly not. That position is ridiculous in the extreme.

Third—"Should the word be dropped altogether?" I think it makes very little difference. It is seldom or never used in any marriage service save the Episcopal, and that service as a whole is so deeply loved and revered, with all its antiquated phraseology and references, that when it is used, it is accepted for the sake of sentiment and tradition and associations. The word is nothing; the spirit of obedience—obedience to the highest ideals of love and loyalty and duty, obedience to the spirit of harmony and peace—this is the only important matter. Here is true the old word: "The letter killeth; the spirit giveth life."

Washington, D. C. GRACE DUFFIELD GOODWIN.

The Promise to "Obey" Has Lost Its Meaning Now, Writes Alice T. Bartram

I THINK there is no danger of the average American woman obeying her husband in the old-fashioned acceptation of the term. Therefore, why let her solemnly promise, in the presence of God and all witnesses, to do what she has not the slightest intention of doing? On the other hand, there is absolutely no danger of the average American husband expecting his wife to obey him. Conditions in the home and society have so changed that the original meaning of the word "obey," when used between husband and wife, has become obsolete. When such a condition of mutual understanding and agreement has been reached by both contracting parties, why retain a word in the ceremony that does not express the desire or conviction of either?

Brooklyn, N. Y. ALICE T. BARTRAM.

Both Sides Equally Should Pledge Obedience, Writes Alice Hubbard

SHOULD the bride pledge obedience?" Yes! Absolute obedience to her own highest individuality and personality, obedience to the God within her, every time. "Should both sides equally pledge it?" Absolutely. The man should pledge himself to be obedient to the God within him—the very highest. The word "obey" should be dropped from a marriage ceremony unless so used.

That any husband should obey any wife, or that any wife should obey any husband in the old sense of the word, belongs to a barbaric age. It suggests servitude and comes directly to us from the time when the husband literally owned the wife, just as in Spain today the husband has power over the wife and can whip her into obedience.

Marriage in a democracy is a partnership. Mutuality of interests on a lofty basis of friendship, thrilled with love, is to my mind the only excuse for marriage. No promise made at a marriage ceremony can be enforced except to keep the letter of the law, and when the spirit of marriage is gone, the real marriage is terminated. ALICE HUBBARD.

"Obey" Need Not Worry Married Folk Who Love Each Other, Writes a Leading Philadelphia Woman Editor

WHEN two intelligent people bear a sincere and profound love for each other, to my mind it makes very little difference whether the word "obey" is retained or omitted from their marriage ceremony, since their life together will, in any event, be one of perfect accord. It will not be necessary for them to worry about which is to obey the other. But, if marriage is to be put on a coldly business-like, matter-of-fact basis; if, in other words, it is to be a mere partnership without the depths of mutual understanding which alone make marital life beautiful, then by all means the word "obey," that men of a certain calibre take as a license for all sorts of brutalities and insults, should be eliminated from the service.

Marriage a Matter of Reasonable Adjustment, Writes Kathleen Norris, Author of "Mother"

THEORETICALLY, I believe the man should be head of his house, and the wife promise to respect his authority. But actually, I do not believe the word "obey" has any value whatever. A husband whose influence depended on this blind promise alone would not deserve authority; and a good wife, reminded of her wedding vow, and caused to do something she thought unwise because of it, would have small respect for him. Between happily married folk, any decision is surely a matter of reasonable adjustment, and I believe that millions of us love and honor so much that the third word (spoken or unspoken) is a sort of silent partner to the contract. If love goes, and honor goes, there is nothing left anyway. I believe the very bride who began this discussion will laugh at herself in another year. KATHLEEN NORRIS.

"Obey" Should Be Retained, Writes the President of the Uncle Remus Association

SINCE all that is highest, holiest and best has come down to us through the ages, and since the church has been the instrument used for our advancement; and woman above all has been most uplifted, most broadened and blessed — most freed from the shackles that bound her mentally and morally —she above all others should be last to prove a stumbling-block.

Marriage should not be entered into lightly or unadvisedly and aught that would detract from the sanctity of the marriage relation, or lower the influence of the church for good, should be fearlessly put aside.

Mary Stewart Cutting

The altered conditions consequent upon our advancing civilization will, I know, be strongly urged in favor of omitting the word "obey" from the marriage ceremony; yet the sanctity of the marriage tie is the foundation-stone upon which this civilization is builded, and I would be slow to advocate any change that would tend to undermine that foundation.

If the church ceremony is not sufficiently reverenced to accept it as a whole, its services should not be asked or given. Let the civil marriage ceremony suffice for those who would seek to dishonor the church by mutilating her service.

Atlanta, Ga. MARGARET WILSON.

A Barbaric Survival, Writes Harriet Prescott Spofford, Well-Known Author

IF HIGH dignitaries in the church declare a marriage illegal if the word "obey" is omitted from the ceremony, they ought to know. And if it is so, laws should at once be made which would allow the omission of the obnoxious word and legalize marriages already made with that omission. Any other course is cruelty.

It is possible that originally the word had a somewhat different significance; but it is the survival of a barbaric period, when a wife was a piece of property as much as a horse or a dog, and it should be put out of commission in an era where it has come to be understood that men born of slaves can never reach their full stature.

Let the Word "Obey" Stand, Writes Amelia E. Barr, the Well-Known Author

IN MY youth women were educated not to do, but to suffer. They accepted marriage with all the obligations the ceremony demanded; and no doubt the majority of them found, as I did, that in "obeying" they commanded; and by renunciation, obtained all they desired. These women knew that

A woman's rank lies in the fulness of her womanhood.

A different kind of woman is said to represent her sex to-day. She is aggressive; she has exacting pretentions, and what she calls advanced opinions; and she claims to be highly educated and yet is uneducated in the worst sense of the word. My observation teaches me that such women either become old-fashioned women on the birth of their first baby, or else that they drive their husbands to everlasting despair.

It does not matter a pin point whether the word "obey" is dropped or retained in the marriage ceremony. The average English woman who has been used to "obeying" all her life—parents, teachers, ministers, elder brothers, chaperons and the aged and honorable—will continue her gracious and willing submission. The average American woman who begins her

China Proclaims the New Republic

THE Republic of China is now a thing accomplished. On February 12, three imperial edicts were issued. The first, in the name of the dowager empress and the boy emperor Pu Yi, abdicates the throne and vests the sovereignty of the empire in the people. It commands Yuan Shi Kai to organize the members of the provisional republican government and to form a great republic, uniting Manchus, Chinese, Mongols, Mohammedans and Tibetans. The concluding words of the edict are these:

"We, the empress dowager and the emperor, will thus be enabled to live in retirement, free from responsibilities and cares, and enjoying without interruption the nation's courteous treatment."

The second edict deals with the details of establishing the republic, and the third urges the maintenance of peace and approves the conditions agreed upon with the republicans. Emperor Pu Yi is to retain his title and be respected as a foreign monarch; he is to receive a pension of 4,000,000 taels and to reside temporarily in the Forbidden City, to be permitted to sacrifice at the ancestral tombs and to retain the palace attendants and the imperial property. The imperial princes retain their various ranks and titles. All citizens in the empire are to have the same rights and privileges as the Chinese. In the third edict the empress dowager deprecates the continuance of the civil war, and expresses hopes of early peace. She commands the cabinet and viceroys to perform their duties faithfully.

There has been no serious disorder in Peking. Dr. Sun Yat Sen retains the provisional presidency but desires to be relieved and Yuan Shi Kai may be elected to the office. It is yet too early to estimate the results of this tremendous transformation by which from three hundred to four hundred millions of souls become the citizens of the world's youngest and largest republic. It is the greatest event of its kind in human history. In facing the difficult task before it—that of welding the vast empire into a homogeneous republic—the government will doubtless encounter many obstacles; but the same sagacity and remarkable ability that have been in evidence during the recent crisis may soon succeed in accomplishing even this seemingly impossible task.

Our appeal in behalf of the famine orphans of China, now being cared for by the Christian missionaries there, and some seven hundred of whom are in need of support, is meeting with many cordial responses. These children are part of the two thousand little famine waifs who were taken in by the missionaries at different stations and who, owing to various causes, are now unprovided for unless generous friends come to their rescue through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In a time of civil war, with much suffering in the different provinces, and with all food at famine prices, it is peculiarly trying for the missionaries even to contemplate what might be the fate of these little ones were they to be turned away because of non-support. Our readers, understanding the situation, are now doing all they can, by sending their contributions, to assure the welfare of the children for a time at least. Their gifts will be applied to the support of the famine orphans through the Missionary Committee at Chinkiang, which has done such splendid service of this character for several years past.

WOMEN ON THE MARRIAGE SERVICE PLEDGE

life by ruling her parents and, later on, who defies teachers and superiors of all kinds, is likely to go through life in the same spirit. The word "obey" to her means a challenge to disobey; and she would not consider her husband's commands for any arrangement of the alphabet.

I should let the word "obey" stand in the marriage ceremony. It does no harm. It may sometimes do good.

AMELIA E. BARR.

Cornwall on Hudson, N. Y.

One of America's Leading Clubwomen Does Not Believe "Obedience" Essential

NEITHER the word "obey" nor any other word is an essential part of a marriage service. Nothing is essential except mutual consent, and even that need not be expressed in words. Sentiment and custom have made mutual promises seem fitting.

The bride should not pledge obedience. The relation of the husband to the wife is not that of master. Neither side should pledge obedience. The relation is an interdependent one in which the obligation and interest is mutual, and the judgment of each is best in its own line.

In the early days, when a wife was bought, when she was a chattel, almost a slave, untaught and untrained, the word "obey" may have seemed necessary. In the present day and generation it is obsolete, and means nothing. It should be dropped from the marriage service altogether.

Yonkers, N. Y. FANNY H. CARPENTER.

There Should Be No Question of Authority, Writes Christine Terhune Herrick, Author

I DO not think the bride should pledge obedience any more than the bridegroom should. Mutual consideration should lead them to follow one another's wishes, but there should be no question of authority on the part of either.

CHRISTINE TERHUNE HERRICK.

New York City.

No Woman Really Expects to Obey, Writes Marion Harland, the Veteran Author

TO MY mind, "obey" is better dropped, since it has virtually become a dead letter, and the retention of it adds a touch of farce to an otherwise solemn service. No woman really expects to obey her husband and no bridegroom worth marrying expects to exact obedience from his wife.

The word "obey" in the marriage service is to me a relic of medieval days and conditions.

New York City. MARION HARLAND.

A Literary Bostonian Who Loyally Defends the Marriage Shrine

OF COURSE, as a churchwoman, I can have but one opinion regarding the word "obey" in the marriage service, or of any word or phrase in the communion or the burial service: that any ritual of the church is not a matter for fantastic innovations.

LILIAN WHITING.

Boston, Mass.

Might as Well Be Omitted, Thinks Jeannette L. Gilder, Author

NEVER having been a bride and never expecting to be one, my opinion on this subject could not have much importance. Nevertheless, as the word "obey" means nothing in this connection, I should think it might as well be omitted.

New York. JEANNETTE L. GILDER.

Great Rose & Flower Offers

THE GREAT popularity of our Rose Offer last year has induced us to make arrangements to present to CHRISTIAN HERALD friends, for the Spring of 1912, a careful selection of the very finest Roses and most beautiful high-grade flowers. As a leader we offer, first, the rose which we believe to be the Queen of all Rosedom, the newly created Climbing American Beauty Rose. No illustration can do justice to its magnificence.

CLIMBING AMERICAN BEAUTY ROSE

THIS new and wonderfully beautiful rose is the old American Beauty in all its glory and fragrance, developed into a hardy outdoor, climbing rose, a prolific bloomer, with a strong habit of growth, thriving in any situation where a climbing or pillar rose is desired. One plant of this new rose will produce twenty times as many blooms in June as the old American Beauty, besides blooming more or less continuously throughout the entire summer. The growers of this rose counted over nine hundred blossoms and buds on one four year old bush last summer. The roses grow on a single stem and measure 3 to 4 inches in diameter and have the same delicious fragrance as the old American Beauty Rose. The old rose is rarely satisfactory when planted in the open ground, while the new rose has proved perfectly hardy in any part of the United States, and stands heat and drought as perfectly as any roses grown.

A NEW AND WONDERFULLY BEAUTIFUL ROSE

The American Beauty in all its glory and fragrance, but hardy as an oak; a prolific bloomer and of strong habit of growth, thriving and blooming in almost any situation

THE Climbing American Beauty must not be classified among the old-fashioned climbers of the Rambler type. It is distinct from them in its very superior quality, and though it can be trained successfully to trellises and porches, it is also unequaled as a pillar rose. It grows magnificently in bush form, as shown in the illustration, which is a reproduction of the original bush, photographed in colors by the French Autochrome process, giving an absolutely perfect reproduction in its natural colors. No lover of beautiful Roses should fail to plant the Climbing American Beauty, as it is a worthy ornament to any garden, and its beauty and fragrance will prove a lasting pleasure. It has a fine foliage that does not burn with the sun, and its thick, glossy leaves keep on the bush all summer, giving a pleasing appearance in happy contrast to the brown leaves of some of the Rambler type.

OUR OFFER—We will send two strongly rooted rosebushes, 8 or 9 inches in height, postpaid, as a reward to any subscriber who will induce a friend or neighbor not now on our list to subscribe for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year at $1.50.

10 MAGNIFICENT BRILLIANT-HUED CANNAS 10

The Garden Magazine recently said: "In our own country, Antoine Wintzner has accomplished more than all the European breeders put together, and is most largely responsible for our modern appreciation of the Canna in American gardens."

THESE magnificent Cannas are the varieties which won 40% of all the awards at the recent International Trial of Canna Lilies made by the Royal Horticultural Society of England. Two hundred and twenty varieties were tested and the (C. & J.) Cannas included in our offer were among those to win in every color class represented. The Cannas we offer all come direct from the Nurseries under the charge of Antoine Wintzner. Our splendid collection is made up of the following five named varieties, as illustrated and described below, together with five other varieties, all different, making ten in all.

GLADIATOR—Is a healthy, strong, vigorous grower, with fine green foliage and large heads of flowers that stand the storms and hot sunshine better than any other Canna. Color is yellow, spotted with red. Blooms early and late.

VENUS—The color is a gay rosy pink, with a mottled border of creamy yellow. It blooms splendidly, with heads erect and flowers always bright, because the old ones drop off as soon as the new ones come.

"WYOMING"—Giant Flowering Purple-foliaged Canna—This is one of the most majestic Cannas. Blossoms orange-colored, true orchid-shaped, with large rounded petals that flap and flutter in the breeze like glistening silken flags. Grows seven feet high.

MARTHA WASHINGTON—The flowers are extra large, often measuring five inches across. Color, clear bright rose pink. It is a healthy, vigorous grower and prodigious bloomer.

PRESIDENT McKINLEY—Deep, rich crimson flowers; beautifully formed. A low, compact grower.

OUR OFFER—We will send these ten Cannas, postpaid, as a reward to any subscriber who will induce a friend or neighbor, not now on our list, to subscribe for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, at $1.50.

OR—If you are an old subscriber about to renew, simply send us 50 cents in addition to the regular yearly subscription price and we will send the ten Cannas and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to you for one year, postpaid.

OR—To old subscribers who have recently renewed their subscriptions, we will send the ten Cannas, postpaid, on receipt of only fifty cents.

This Offer Expires March 30, 1912.

HILLS OF SNOW

THE BAILEY PLANTATION

BY ANNE McQUEEN

BUT, mother," argued John Bailey, "it's so foolish for you to stay on alone out here at the plantation, so far from town, when you can come and live with Florence and me, and have every comfort the city affords. You won't have even a telephone put in this house!"

"I'd be afraid, John. Every time it rang I would be thinking something dreadful had happened to you. Besides, old Jacob and Chloe sleep right out in the yard, and Cindy always sleeps on a cot in my room. There's no danger. And remember, son, that old trees won't bear transplanting. I'll thrive best on my own soil!"

"All right, Mammy—there's nothing more to be said," smiled her son, patting the little silvery curls that would stray about her temples in a girlish manner that was very mortifying to Mrs. Bailey. "I won't root you up, but I've my own opinion about it, just the same!"

His big car was waiting at the gate, to take him back to the city, fifty miles away. He was a middle-aged man, a prosperous merchant, married to a woman who was a social leader, and, being without children, very much interested in public affairs. But somehow they found little time to come out to the plantation and spend a day with his mother.

Everybody in the county knew the Bailey plantation—the fine old homestead which had been in the family for generations. There were only two left now, the mother and son. The place belonged to Mrs. Bailey, and she loved it with a passionate devotion, being quite content to live alone with only such companionship as her old colored servants and the few neighbors afforded. She watched her son speeding away to the city, where all his interests were, with a tenderly pathetic little smile. "John's a good boy," she sighed, "but—the old rhyme is true: "A son is a son till he gets him a wife, but a daughter's a daughter all the days of her life!" Dear me! I oughtn't complain, but I wish John had children, or that I had a daughter of my very own!"

It was not many days after this that she sat in her big wide-armed rocker on the front porch and hummed happily an old hymn tune, as she placidly darned a beautiful old damask tablecloth. It was early summer, and the yard was brimming with flowers, beds of sweet old-fashioned flowers that had always been favorites with her, with her mother, and even her grandmother, who had planted many of the old shrubs.

Beyond the yard stretched acres of wide lawn, covered with a luxuriant growth of Bermuda grass, which grew rankly in the shade of the giant old trees—beautiful, century-old live-oaks, their hoary limbs mantled mercifully in gray Spanish moss, satin-leaved magnolias, stately black walnuts, graceful wild cherry trees—every one a personality to the mistress of the grove. To be sure, it was rather weedy, for Jacob was getting old and couldn't be expected to do the work of a young man. Mrs. Bailey always said, cheerfully, that Jacob would reach everything in time. There was no need to hurry.

Her gaze, resting lovingly upon her friends, the flowers and trees, wandered down the avenue leading to the public road, and saw with surprise the gate open and John Bailey drive through in his automobile.

"Dear me!" she exclaimed, in a pleasant little flutter of excitement; "if there isn't John coming again! I wonder what has happened to bring him so soon. There's a stranger in the car, too."

She arose in hospitable haste to greet her guests, descending the long flight of stone steps and walking through the wilderness of blooming things to meet them at the yard gate. Dressed in her immaculate, newly laundered print gown, a little linen collar, fastened with a coral brooch at her throat, her brown eyes misty, her cheeks tinged like the faint pink of crab-apple blossoms, and the little runaway curls straying youthfully about her temples, she presented a charming picture—a mother anybody might be proud to possess!

"This is Mr. Stacy, mother," said her son, presenting the stranger. "He is from up North, and I brought him out to take pot luck—some of the collards and dumplings, the middlings and hominy that we folks down South love."

His mother smiled indulgently upon her son. "He thinks that is a joke," she explained. "You mustn't pay any attention to him. I promise you won't have to eat any of his favorite dishes."

She did, indeed, give them a good luncheon—delicate food, well cooked and daintily served, to honor the guest, in the fine old Wedgwood that had been a present from England to her grandmother, a wedding gift from friends oversea, and for which John showed a sad lack of appreciation, preferring the modern, gold-banded dinner set for which Florence had paid a princely price. But if her son was unappreciative, the stranger was not, for his eyes were keen to notice and his tongue ready to praise all the treasures Mrs. Bailey displayed to do him honor. She glowed with pride at his praise, and his right knowledge of their value.

"'Sit here and rest and let me tell you about it all'"

"But my son doesn't care for old things," she said, with a deprecating smile. "He is altogether modern, and I am of the past generation—I, and all that I possess. If I had a daughter, now, she would understand."

"You must take Mr. Stacy over the house, mother; show him the old furniture and things. He can appreciate them, if I don't seem to," said John Bailey, rather carelessly.

"If he would care," said Mrs. Bailey, with sparkling eyes, "I shall be delighted to show him everything worth seeing."

So the stranger was shown over the house, and was told the history of the most interesting things. He listened carefully, sometimes jotting down a few brief words in a little book, when anything particularly impressed him. It had been a long time since Mrs. Bailey had found such an appreciative listener, and she thoroughly enjoyed his visit. Particularly enthusiastic was he when, after going through the house, his hostess took him out and showed him her historical flower beds and the beauties of the lawn, with its wonderful old trees and shrubs. He did not, as John would have done, comment unfeelingly upon her old gardener's neglect.

"This is just the thing!" he exclaimed, exultantly; adding, as Mrs. Bailey seemed a little puzzled, "I mean, it is quite ideal—a home that is rich in historic beauty. One does not often come across them now."

Her son had not accompanied them; he had sat on the porch and smoked, reading a paper he had brought along from the city. "Well," he asked, as they returned, "does the place please you? Or has mother set more value on her possessions than they really merit?"

"It is quite perfect," declared Mr. Stacy. "I could not have hoped to find—I did not think there was just such a place in all the State. I thank you for bringing me out and giving me a chance to see it."

"Ah, you see somebody else appreciates old things!" exulted his mother, happily.

But, after the fashion of mothers, she pondered over the little worried look in his eyes as he bade her good-by; at a little unnatural restraint in his manner, hardly noticeable when he was present, but something to worry over, as mothers will, after he had gone.

The next day she knew. For John Bailey came again the long distance from the city to explain. The man from the North was an agent, in search of a suitable place for a client who wanted just such a home. And he had offered a wonderfully good price for it.

"But remember, mother," said her son, his own eyes cast down so that he failed to see the terrified amazement in hers, "you are not obliged to sell unless you are perfectly willing. Only you know that Florence and I worry about you out here, and would both be more than glad to have you with us. You know your son will try to make you happy. And—and, mother, it is hard for me to tell you this, but—I need money. Need it so much, in fact, that I must go to the wall unless I can raise it mighty soon. This man has offered a fancy price for the old place because of this rich client's whim to have an old-fashioned, furnished house. But, mammy, not unless you are willing—not unless you want to."

The mother-heart pulsed the blood back into the pale face. Her boy was in trouble, and she must help him. The price of the sacrifice, be it great or small, must make no difference.

"Certainly I am willing, if that is the case, son," she said gently. "Will the price offered be quite sufficient? Will it keep your business from going to ruin?"

"It will be more than enough." He breathed freely again; after all, his mother did not mind—so very much. It was a great relief to him; now he could hold up his head in the business world again.

"Stacy is only waiting to see if you are willing to sell to bring the deal to a close. You see, mother"—he looked wistfully into her face; the big, forty-year-old man was a little boy again, and in trouble—"I didn't know where in the world to raise a loan. Times are so panicky that money is all tied up—nobody will lend. And I have just got to have some money, right now, or I lose out."

"You shall have it, Johnny-boy," soothed the little mother, patting the head of her troubled child. "The house is but so much brick and mortar—the furniture, as you sometimes say, 'junk.' I shall be quite happy with you and Florence—in the city."

And she dreaded the city. She was as helpless as a child in it. John and Florence often laughed at her because of this fear, but nothing could conquer it—except a mother's heart, which is the bravest thing in all the world.

She gave him his dinner, which he enjoyed very much, now that the weight of anxiety was removed; and she tranquilly made pretense to sip her tea, and so managed with her food that he thought she ate and drank—which was sufficient.

"But you must give me a little time, son," she begged, and John, jubilant with gratitude, vowed she should have all the time she wanted. But she shook her head. "No, the people will want to be coming—to spend the summer. I am glad they will see the garden while it is at its best, and I only want a few weeks longer to have everything in perfect order."

So it happened that she went about putting the house in order as if for the coming of a bride to her new home. Her old servants, to whom she told nothing of the change, dreading their sorrow, wondered, but obeyed their mistress without questioning, only marveling when they were alone at the reason for the unusual work.

"Sump'n fine's gwineter happen, I reckon," quoth Cindy, the housemaid, to her parents, the cook and the gardener. "I 'clare, I ain't seed ole Miss so pertickler before since Marse John married. I'm 'spectin' sump'n good to happen."

"Law, chile," replied Chloe, her mother. "You can't recollec' de big time 'fo' de war, when Miss was a lil' gal, and den a young lady. Balls and parties gwine on all de time. Folks come in carriges, dem days, and staid a week at a time. You ain't never see nothin' like 'em in yo' time and generation."

"Miss had me scrubbin' dem brass firedogs all day," sighed old Jacob. "Hit's putty worrisome, scrubbin'. But somehow she don't look like nothin' good gwineter happen."

But at last even the critical eyes of the mistress could see no blemish in the house. Everything was ready, except her own room. She had left that for the last. When her own few personal belongings would be packed up she would give orders to Cindy to see that it was put to rights. She could not quite bear to see any change made in it.

Having everything perfect within, Mrs. Bailey walked out one day to give puttering, slow old Jacob patient orders about putting the garden to rights. She was glad, with a heart-breaking sort of gladness, that the new owners would see her dear home in its fullest perfection of beauty. If she were only there when they came she would see that the whole house was made sweet with flowers. But she could not do that—she would leave Cindy to attend to it. John had promised to let her know in plenty of time, so that she would be away before the strangers took possession of the house and the treasures of her fathers.

She walked down the white, graveled walk, bordered with rose geranium, to pluck a handful of spice-pinks from the bed by the gate. Her own mother had planted that bed, when she was only a little girl standing by and "helping," as she always did with the flowers. As she stood caressing the pinks with fingers that trembled a little, absorbed in old memories, she failed to see the young woman who had opened the gate at the road and was now walking rapidly up the avenue. A handsome young woman she was, with a fine, decisive face, as of a person with a will of her own, one accustomed to be obeyed. She approached the frail little figure, standing unseeing in the gateway arched with roses, caressing her pinks with her little, wrinkled fingers, and held out both her own firm, strong, white hands in greeting.

"I am certain that you are Mrs. Bailey," spoke the stranger in a voice as firm and sweet as her face. "I am Katherine North, the client for whom Mr. Stacy was commissioned to buy a furnished house."

Mrs. Bailey, taken by surprise, swayed just a little, a pallor stealing over her delicate face. The girl, quick to see, threw her strong young arm about the drooping figure and drew her to a seat on a rustic bench by the gate.

"Sit here and rest—and let me tell you about it all," she said, with loving authority.

And Mrs. Bailey, with warm young fingers clasping her own, leaned weakly upon the bench, too feeble to protest, and let the new owner of the Bailey plantation have her will.

"You see, when I commissioned Mr. Stacy to find me a real, certified old Southern plantation, with the house furnished in real old furniture, I imagined, if such a beautiful place could be found, that it would be the property of somebody who had died and left it to be sold. But when he returned and told me the circumstances, and of how proud you were of all your dear old things and your beautiful, beautiful home, and—and that your son needed the money or you wouldn't have sold, he believed, why, I just came as straight as I could to tell your son, first of all, that I was only too glad, having more money than is good for me, to consider it as a loan, and that you were not, for any consideration, to sell your home. I just simply will not have it! So there! And furthermore, you never, never shall give it up to anybody! Only, as I've never, since I was a baby, owned a mother, and have never had a home—just been brought up in boarding-schools and hotels—I wanted to beg you—just for one summer—on trial, to adopt me for your own daughter. And I do believe I'll be such a good daughter that you will be willing for me to belong to you always."

Mrs. Bailey straightened up; she patted the silvery curls into place and wiped away the tears from cheeks that were pink as crab-apple blossoms with excitement. "My dear," she said, briskly, "come right into the house this minute! I have everything lovely for you. And you shall have the blue room that opens into mine—the one with grandma's bridal furniture in it."

Into the hall she led the newcomer, calling to Cindy on the staircase, looking round-eyed upon them: "Run to the kitchen, Cindy, and bring Chloe and Jacob. I want Miss Katherine to know you all. She is the guest I have been expecting."

And Cindy, elate with prophecy fulfilled, hurried joyfully to the kitchen, where old Jacob dreamed a dream of peace on the woodbox in the corner, and Chloe, anxious because of the mistress's poor appetite, was making Maryland biscuit to tempt it, beating the dough with rhythmic strokes, keeping time to the old hymn tune she was droning.

"Come, mammy and daddy," exulted their daughter, "you all come right up in de hall, ole Miss say. She want you to see de young lady she been 'spectin' and 'parin' for. What I tole you? Now she done come, I lay you dey's gwineter be joysome times at de Bailey plantation agin."

The house, shining in spotless splendor, testified to it; the burdened beauty of the rosebushes nodded affirmation; the breeze, whispering the secret to the moss-muffled old oaks, stirred them to murmurings of drowsy approval of the news.

In the room upstairs, the blue room with the dainty old furniture sent from oversea to a bride of the dead past, the girl with the understanding heart looked down into the shining face of the mistress of the mansion, and mentally confirmed the fact. Hereafter there would be only joysome times at the Bailey plantation!

A VALUABLE ALMANAC

At last I find the time for expressing to you my sincere gratitude for The Christian Herald Almanac for 1912 you sent me. I find it replete with the most valuable information, and know that I shall make almost daily use of it. Every number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD strikes a sympathetic chord in my heart, especially the reports concerning the Bowery Mission. I am doing similar work, though on a smaller scale, here in St. Louis. God's richest blessing be with you and your work in the new year. F. W. HERZBERGER.

Everywhere we go the lesson of good teeth is told

What more common than our admiration of a pretty face turned to disappointment when that face smiles!

True, the clever woman whose teeth are not attractive, when she must smile, never lets us see.

But how delightful when the open smile, in features beautiful or plain, suddenly dazzles us with the glory of perfect teeth.

You who have fine teeth, whether through good fortune or through wise care, or through the dentist's skill, safeguard them by daily night and morning use of

Dr. Lyon's
PERFECT
Tooth Powder

Prepared for almost half a century by a doctor of dental surgery.

Begin early to make the use of Dr. Lyon's Tooth Powder a life habit with your children, and thus insure them perfect teeth and consequent fine appearance and health.

The great virtue of Dr. Lyon's is that it provides a perfect dentifrice in powder form, having no gelatine, glucose or honey to leave sticky masses between the teeth to encourage decay.

It polishes, thoroughly cleanses the teeth, removes discoloration and tartar and imparts a natural fragrance to the breath.

What Dr. Lyon's does not do should be entrusted only to your dentist to do.

OUR COMFORT CORNER

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Morning Mood

THE morning mood should be cheery. To be fretful, grumpy, and low-spirited in the morning betokens a life out of sympathy with the great beating heart of the universe. The sun has been shining for thousands of years, but every new morning sees it rise with gladness. To use the strong figure of the Psalmist, the sun comes forth rejoicing as a bridegroom from his chamber.

This is the same whether the clouds obscure the morning brightness, or the east is splendid with gold and rose. The sun is never anything but cheerful. The day's work lies before it, and the light will not fade until another day's work must begin on another side of the globe.

With us, if we waken with headache, due very possibly to lack of ventilation during the night, if we waken disturbed in nerves, burdened with anxiety or wearied by the pressure of care, we too often spoil the morning by inflicting our low mood on the rest of the family. To be morose at the breakfast table is a sin and a shame. The curious fact is that numbers of people regard sin with horror. They frown upon iniquity as though it were something apart from themselves, something committed only by actual prisoners at the bar of justice. Little do they imagine that at the bar of the Infinite it is judged a sin to be cross with a child, snub the sensitive wife who is doing her best to please a peevish husband, or, on the other hand, to pour coffee, as some good women do, with the air of injured martyrs. Whatever disturbs the fastidity and destroys the good cheer of a household is sin. There are women and men who rarely get themselves in hand so that they are cheerful companions and decent members of the home until after breakfast in the morning. The morning mood should strike the keynote for the day. If any of us have drifted into a habit of depression at breakfast, let us turn a sharp corner and begin over again to greet the day as the children and the birds do, with laughter and song.

Worth-while Accomplishment

THE lady who was writing a letter looked up from her desk and glanced about the room. "How do you spell parallel?" she said. Her husband smilingly spelled the word for her. She thanked him, saying, "If I dash straight on I seldom make a mistake, but if I stop to think how to spell a word I become so confused that I am lost. How am I to spell psychology? How can I remember the difference between believe and deceive? What is the difference between till and until? I inherit a disability in the line of spelling. My mother has often told me that she was a poor speller."

The husband laid his paper down, and seeing that his wife's letter was finished, folded and securely fastened in its envelope, also addressed and stamped, said, "Now, Elizabeth, let me give you a bit of advice. Never tell anybody that you cannot spell. Your spelling is very creditable to your teachers and your education. Nobody can inherit a disability in that line. If your mother does not spell well, it is her misfortune, and may be her fault, for she was brought up on Webster's spelling book and McGuffy's readers. You, poor child, came along when the blue speller was out of fashion and the dear old reading book, going from first to fifth grade, had been forgotten on the top shelf. Still, you do spell very well except when you stop to think about it. I have determined that our little Winifred and Reginald shall be inducted into everything that makes for good spelling. They shall be drilled in Latin and learn about derivatives; they shall recite to me every day out of the dictionary. They shall write down columns of spelling at my dictation. I shall teach them to look attentively at the pages of the books they read. Spelling is a worth-while accomplishment within the reach of every one."

The lady had risen to leave the room. She paused long enough to run her fingers through her husband's hair and ruffle it up becomingly. "You dear," she said. "When are you going to have time personally to conduct Winnie and Reggie through the labyrinth of juvenile education? I will help you, and we will do our best. Perhaps we can persuade the church sociable to enliven its dulness with an old-fashioned spelling match, a prize to be given to the best speller and a consolation premium to the worst. That would be a step in the right direction. Perhaps, too, we can persuade the teachers to pay a little more attention to this simple and easy, but often neglected branch of study. Keep up your heart, my dear. Our children are clever, and I am not much afraid that they will turn out a disgrace to us."

Phonetic spelling is rather attractive, but is beset by briars and thorns. The English language is a composite. It is like a river with streams flowing in from many sources. The lady and her husband were in the right in determining that their children should know how to spell. Nothing more surely convicts one of illiteracy than a glaring error in this direction.

The Pies That Mother Made

MOST young wives are familiar with the reminiscent comparison made by husbands when certain articles of diet are placed before them. The oat meal porridge in the morning, and the mince pie at dessert, the pound cake, crullers and preserves at luncheon or dinner are very good, but not so good as those "mother used to make." As for fish-balls, they may be as light as feathers and golden brown in color, melting in the mouth, yet toothsome as they are they do not equal the fish-balls on the table in the days that are no more. Mother's cooking, from the buckwheat cakes, eaten with maple syrup, to mother's hot gingerbread, a delicacy surpassing anything ever turned out by a Parisian chef, and mother's home-made candy, live forever in the memory of her sons, and are often alluded to in the presence of their wives.

There cannot be the least doubt that history repeats itself, and that the mothers themselves went through the same process and knew all about it when they, too, were young. The grown man forgets that he does not bring to the three meals a day the appetite of the growing boy. The boy was always hungry. He was seldom critical. He never struggled with wearied nerves or chronic indigestion. Unless the man can retain the boy's appetite unimpaired to the very end, he will probably go on fancying that mother's cooking altogether surpassed the cooking of to-day.

Heedlessness and Firearms

A LEGAL permit is required before the private citizen can carry a revolver on his person. One sometimes wishes that similar permits universally guarded the possession of revolvers within the precincts of a home. Pistols present temptations to small boys. If in the house, whether loaded or unloaded, they should be kept under lock and key. The tragedy is so familiar that we had ceased to be shocked as we ought when a pistol is recklessly handled, and, the trigger being touched, a bullet is discharged with fatal effect. The reckless pointing of a pistol has resulted more times than we can count in the death of a child or an adult. Revolvers and poisons and all sorts of deadly missiles and agents should be out of the reach of irresponsible youth. Two little friends were discussing a camping expedition for next summer in a New York apartment house the other day. One boy, in boy fashion, said that pistols would be necessary, and brought out his grandfather's weapon with boyish pride. A moment later his chum lay dead upon the floor.

A Modern Savonarola Dead

I AM filled with a feeling of joy and well being. I can appear before God, for I am at peace with my conscience and my reason." These were the last conscious words of Père Hyacinthe, who died in Paris on February 9.

The story of the life of this gifted man is one of the most romantic in church or civil history. He lived well on to a hundred years, from 1827 to 1912. Born at Orleans, ordained to the Catholic priesthood in Notre Dame at Paris at the age of twenty-four, a professor of theology, then a brother of the Barefoot Carmelite Friars, his eloquence flowed forth in the French capital in 1864 and won the attention of the world. Intensely spiritual and fiercely pure, he denounced the atheism and vice of the city in a series of six Advent sermons at Notre Dame on the subject of "A Personal God." Crowds swept to hear him, and for many years he continued his fervent and powerful preaching at the Cathedral. The archbishop, then the emperor Napoleon III. in his palace, finally Pope Pius at the Vatican, became his auditors.

But his earnestness became too earnest for the ecclesiastical machinery. He was brave enough to say at last: "It is my most profound conviction that if France in particular and the Latin races in general are delivered over to anarchy—social, moral, religious—the principal cause of it is to be found, not, certainly, in Catholicism itself, but in the way in which Catholicism has for a long time been understood and practiced." This brought to a crisis the antagonism against him, and he was ordered by Dominique, head of the Carmelite order, to return to the convent. He refused to do so, was expelled from the order, and excommunicated as an apostate. But he continued to toil in the Protestant ranks as he had toiled in the Catholic, for the triumph of religion and righteousness.

That a little New York State girl, named Emily Jane, should become an international figure whose story should be identified with that of this illustrious man is one of the surprises of history. Emily Jane Butterfield was born at Oswego, N. Y., in 1833. Her parents moved to Ohio, then a part of the "far West." At eight years of age she became a Sunday School teacher, at sixteen she published some really good poems, at eighteen she married Captain E. R. Merriman. She was intensely religious, but failed to find real peace. Coming to live in Brooklyn, she told Henry Ward Beecher that she often felt the desire to become a Catholic. He was not horrified.

She went to Europe, having been made a widow at the death of Captain Merriman, and, feeling the charm and power of the ancient church at Rome, conferred with Archbishop Darboy, of Paris, and Father Hyacinthe. Concessions were made and, accepting the Nicene Creed, she became a Catholic. Father Hyacinthe received her confession of faith. She went to live in Rome, and the Pope offered to make her a countess if she would conduct a woman's college under his direction. She refused the title because she was an American and declined the offer of funds because she desired to keep on friendly terms with the Italian Government, with which she sympathized in its contentions with the Pope, not believing in the principle of the temporal power of the papacy. She rejoiced when the Eternal City fell into the hands of Victor Emmanuel. When in 1870 the decree of the infallibility of the Pope was promulgated, she contended against its acceptance, and when the council finally adopted it she felt compelled to leave the church.

Father Hyacinthe, believing that his expulsion from the Carmelite order freed him from the vow of celibacy, sought her in marriage, and in 1872 they became husband and wife as Monsieur and Madame Loyson. Their married life was one of great happiness. M. Loyson became curate of the Congregation of Liberal Catholics in Geneva, and later founded a "Gallican" congregation at Paris. When dying he asked that priests of the Greek Armenian Church, and the Rev. Charles Wagner, author of The Simple Life, attend him. His funeral service was held in the Protestant Church of the Oratoire in Paris on February 12.

The Late Frank D. Talmage

THE Rev. Frank D. Talmage passed away at his home in Philadelphia on Febraury 8. He was the son of the late Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, the famous pastor of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, who was for many years the senior editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Frank Talmage was born in Brooklyn and studied at Princeton and Union Theological Seminaries. He entered the ministry in Philadelphia in 1894. He next became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Pittsburg, and accepted a call to the Jefferson Park Presbyterian Church, Chicago, in 1898. In 1907 he assumed charge of the First Presbyterian Church, Los Angeles, Calif., and two years later was called to the Chambers-Wylie Church, of Philadelphia, holding that pastorate until the time of his death.

He was a strong, vigorous preacher and exceedingly popular. For several years his sermons were published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He leaves a widow and four children: Frank, Thomas DeWitt, Susan and Gertrude. Several months ago, he experienced a nervous breakdown, which ultimately resulted in heart-failure. For the last twelve years, he was one of the leading ministers of his denomination, preaching to large audiences in many cities.

Household Hints

To remove coffee-and-milk stains from woolen goods, try the following: Nine parts of water, one part glycerine, one-half part aqua ammonia. Apply with a brush. This mixture should be allowed to remain on the material for twelve hours, and the spot should be moistened several times in that time. Press the fabric between pieces of cloth and rub with a clean rag.

Fresh fruit stains should be rubbed at once with salt. This will keep the spot damp until it can be treated with boiling water. Hold the injured part of the cloth over a basin and pour the water through it. If this does not prove entirely successful, apply a thick paste made of boiled starch, and put the material in the sun. Keep the starch damp, but not wet.

Black silk and all woolen goods can be successfully washed with soap-bark. It is especially good to remove grease spots. Into a quart of cold water steep for ten minutes a handful of soap-bark. Warm this solution, strain, rub well into the fabric, then sponge with clear cold water. While still damp, the material should be ironed, or pinned out on a frame or board.

Coffee-and-milk stains are especially difficult to remove from silk, but the following method has met with repeated success. It is always well to make a trial on an odd piece of the goods, and if, after drying, the color changes, omit the ammonia: Five parts water, five parts glycerine, one-fourth part ammonia. To restore the finish to the fabric, brush with a thin solution of gum-arabic.

A Canadian's View of The Christian Herald

Several years ago, I was a pretty constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but it was gradually dropped. For the past few months, for reasons which it is not necessary to state, it came into my life again. I consider it now one of the best all-round religious papers I have the privilege of reading, and I enjoy and, I think, profit by every department in it. Since the time of the Saviour, there have never been, in my judgment, any three men who have done more for the religious life or for improving the human race, than have the apostle Paul, Abraham Lincoln and Charles Dickens. In this week's issue there are helpful and inspiring articles on each, which every thoughtful Christian should read in the doing of which all would feel an uplifting influence that vastly more than repays all the trouble and cost.

I do not know whether you have many subscribers in Toronto or Canada, but whether or no, it does seem that there is a large field here for extending your influence in the religious and philanthropic life of us Canadians.

Toronto, Can. A. TORONTONIAN.

AMERICAN GIRL PAPERS

Just an Ordinary Everyday Girl

WE TALKED last week here in our own little corner about the enchantment of our everyday life. Do you remember? I am tempted to take up the thread where we broke it, and weave on in much the same strain as before: And if any of you, my girl friends who are so dear to us in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD because we think of you as the young girls of our family, fancy perhaps that I am a dreamer, an idealist among girls whose lives are mostly filled with intensely practical things, read on a little farther and you shall see.

Near to the Ideal

FIRSTLY and forever, I believe that we, as girls, all in the rich beauty of our youth, are very near the ideal of mind and body and spirit. We are not ripe, to be sure. We are just dear, growing girls, and therein is the secret of our charm. Life is ahead with its promise, its possibilities, its humor, its uncertainty. This is the enchanted atmosphere in which we live, and nearly all of the older world would gladly exchange its life for ours. There is no egotism in this, but rather deep humility before a vast truth.

By Way of Being Definite

I PREFER definiteness in these very real things, so I am going to confide to you a secret which I never before willingly admitted: I am what you call just an ordinary, everyday, not-a-whit-pretty girl, with perfectly sincere manners, rather a nice voice, and a keen sense of humor; and these are absolutely the only purely personal charms to which I may justly lay claim. Mother used to tell us when we were children at home that all the beauty and talent on earth would not compensate for an unlovely voice, and we were trained according to mother's theory. Almost any one can have an attractive voice, and it is an unfailing charm, I assure you. I am almost foolishly careful of my hands. My hair I keep glossy and smooth, and as to general neatness of my dress—well, I am in the business world, you see, and there one must be immaculate. I have not very many of the ordinary blessings of life, yet—and here is my secret — never a day goes by but I thank God fervently and humbly for the beauty and the opportunity of my girlhood.

Will you measure your own girlhood by some of the beauty as I set it down here, please? You will be astonished at the result, and we shall feel closer together then.

I am brimful of ideals. Aren't you? And of joyousness and comradeship and ready sympathy. Aren't you? My ambitions are "lofty," like Joe's in Little Women, and almost nothing can completely discourage me. By some simple knack of unworn nerves, I am able to look straight through foolish little annoyances and set them out of my way quite unabashed. This is a part of my nature and of my sense of humor. Are you sure it is not a part of yours, too? And when disappointments come that later might easily crush my spirit and intimidate me, I quite unconsciously shake them off, in much the same way that a shaggy dog shakes the salt sea from his coat and romps into the sunshine to dry.

The Land of Enchantment

A Little Dream World

I SHALL tell you here at some other time, perhaps, about a little dream-world that I have saved out of my childhood, where the big frictions and irritations which invariably are a part of youth dare not intrude.

But this week I want to remind you and you and you, who shall be reading this story, that as surely as the day follows dawn, your lives measure up with most of the very things of which I have been reminding you. I can tell from your letters that many of you are too serious. There is, oh, such a plenty of time for seriousness. We must busy ourselves with beauty, enchantment, enthusiasm, opportunity.

No Pretty Theories

I HAVE no pretty-sounding theories to palm off upon girls, and no one knows better than I that our days are often too discouraging and complex to be courageously endured. But I know too that complexities do vanish and joys come tumbling after in the most astonishing way.

What if we begin this very day to put to service our ambitions and hopes and set them to living down the little bitternesses and disappointments of the morning? What if we make up our minds to remember that, after all, youth is rarely called upon to grapple with things beyond its strength, and that grumbling is only holding our courage at bay? This I call both practical and ideal. I am afraid I have little patience with the modern fashion of magazine writing to girls in a kind of maudlin sentimentality of condolence. I can never quite understand what it is all about, and there is little enough inspiration in it, I am sure. Why, bless my heart! We need no propping up with platitudes and dull philosophies. We are youth. It is clearly up to us to live up to its high calling, with all our might and main. And there is the philosophy of it in a nutshell.

Such a nice March heading drawn by a Cozy Corner little girl who says she is twelve years old, but put neither name nor address on her drawing.

GOOD-NIGHT FOR LITTLE FOLK

I sing the almighty power of God,
That made the mountains rise:
That spread the flowing seas abroad,
And built the lofty skies.
I sing the wisdom that ordained
The sun to rule the day;
The moon shines full at his command,
And all the stars obey.

Lovingly and faithfully yours

The Safe Investment of Your Money

In considering the investment of your money the very first requirement is the security of the principal. There are other features, of course, but the fundamental security of the investment is foremost. The proper selection of an investment bond which has this primary qualification, requires technical knowledge. Naturally and necessarily the experienced banker, whose constant business it is to investigate bonds of all kinds, is possessed of this technical knowledge.

If you are considering the investment of funds, and will state your requirements in the way of interest return, and maturity, and amount, we will be very glad to suggest securities for your attention.

Forms of Investment

EVERY business transaction is a form of contract, written or verbal. It implies the doing of a certain thing for a fixed consideration. There must be in each case a grantor and a grantee, a buyer and a seller. The seller aims to sell at a profit; the buyer aims to buy for his own advantage. That both should gain seems at first glance paradoxical, yet that they may do so we all know—indeed, in the majority of cases they must do so, else all trade, which in its simplest term is a matter of barter, would come to a standstill.

Investments in General

Trade is an exchange of assumed equivalents, but when the things exchanged are of unchangeable values, there can be no gain on either side, as when I hand my friend a ten dollar gold piece and he gives me in return a ten dollar gold certificate. This, however, is an accommodation, and though it is a form of exchange, it lacks the element of mutual gain which is the spirit of all trade transactions. Purchases are of two kinds, viz., those made for immediate consumption, as for food, clothing and housing, and those made for profitable increase, though the former, being essential to the proper compliance with all other transactions, may, in the last economic analysis, be regarded as fixed investments.

In these articles, it has not been our purpose to advise as to the best methods of carrying on farming, manufacturing or storekeeping, for we must assume that the men winning in these callings have a practical knowledge of their own affairs that far outweighs any theories we might have to offer. We have tried, and, we have reason to believe, not without success, to point out to our readers who may have money on hand, saved from their business and not needed for its extension, the best way in which they can invest it, particularly where they cannot be, by reason of a restricted environment, as familiar with the conditions as are those who have made them a special study.

A Word About Stocks

We must assume that our readers, apart from the lessons we have tried to give on that subject, are familiar with the distinction between stocks and bonds as forms of investment; it will also be remembered that in a recent article we pointed out that stocks, in any way preferred, to that extent, are regarded by the courts as having many of the characteristics of bonds or liens. Stocks may be quite as safe as bonds for permanent investments, their only drawback, as has been pointed out, being their lack of that security which gives to the good bond its assured redemption.

There are, of course, constant speculations in every form of bonds, just as there may be in real estate mortgages, but as these forms of security, outside of panicky conditions of the money market, are not subject to violent fluctuations, they do not afford an exciting field for the speculator, who, in his hazards on the rise or fall of the stock, is quite as much of a gambler as is the man who is ready to bet on the turn of a high or low card. It is not our purpose to warn readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD against this pernicious form of speculation, for we feel sure it has no more allurements for them than would any other gambling game, but it is well to have some knowledge of methods that many regard as business, and which are to-day important factors in the world of finance.

We have known men, young and old—and it is sad and amazing to note how soon all engaged in such work take on the wrinkles of anxiety and the hue of age—who plunged into the mad whirl of stock speculation, hoping by a favorable turn in Fortune's wheel to swell their few thousands into millions; but, while we have seen scores who went down to ruin, we never met one who made a permanent success of his ventures and came out whole. These men buy or sell on a margin; that is, they place in the hands of a broker, who is a member of the Stock Exchange, from five to ten per cent. of the value of one hundred or more shares of stock. If they buy and the stock goes up, they win on the rise, less the broker's commission; if they sell and the stock goes down, they gain the difference. Should the stock fluctuate adversely beyond the limit of the deposit, the broker asks for more margin, and if this is not forthcoming the stock is sold, and with it goes the margin. As these transactions usually cover but a few days or a few weeks at the most, even if the gambling element were lacking they could not be classed as serious forms of investment.

Permanent Investors

A majority of security purchasers buy to make their spare cash income-producing. Assured that the interest on the dividends will be paid as promised, there is no occasion for their giving any thought to basic financial principles or to those fundamental conditions that control prices, and yet, if the time could be spared, such a study would well repay the amateur.

Vast as are the sums used by the temporary investor, and great as are the fortunes they have made, they are, in the aggregate, small compared with the gross amount of permanent investments, and the amounts derived from them through dividends and interest. It is the permanent investors who gather in established securities. They invest in the bonds of the nation, of the States and of the municipalities. They are the holders of railroad bonds, of unquestioned "industrials," of public utilities like gas, trolleys and electric plants. They buy the bonds of the best mortgage firms, and in the aggregate they are the best customers of the great financial houses, whose business it is to provide safe securities for investors.

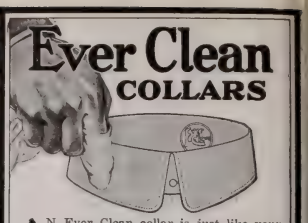
We should not class the permanent investor, because of his wise conservatism, with the non-progressives. It is from the ranks of such that our most successful business men have come. Before a permanent investment can be made, there must be ready money, and with most this can only be had through hard work, constant thrift and a steady self-denial. This effort builds up the strong character; this prudence leads to the permanent investment of savings, and the whole makes for a larger success when the future brings its greater opportunities.

"Second" Eggs on the Farm

ACCORDING to the Department of Agriculture the farmers of the United States lose $5,000,000 annually on account of dirty eggs. This loss is very largely brought about by not gathering the eggs often enough. In wet weather more dirty eggs are found than at any other time. This is caused by the fact that the hen's feet are often covered with mud or other filth, and in going on the nest to lay she soils the eggs already in the nest.

Although dirty eggs may be perfectly fresh, they invariably sell as "seconds," and when but a few dirty eggs are mixed with an otherwise fresh, clean lot, they materially decrease the price of the clean eggs.

An insufficient number of nests is often the cause of many of the dirty eggs found. Eggs are laid on the ground and around the hay and straw stacks, and become stained. On a farm where one nest to every four hens is provided and the nests are kept clean and well bedded, very few dirty eggs are produced.



Ever Clean COLLARS

AN Ever Clean collar is just like your regular collars in shape, material color and finish.

Try to wipe a spot or mark off your regular collar and you spoil it. Wipe an Ever Clean with a damp cloth and it remains just as it always was—minus the spot.

That's the only difference between Ever Clean collars and other collars. Not rubber or celluloid, but just like a regular linen collar. Made in Troy, N. Y., and invisibly waterproofed by our patented German process.

Modern Poultry Keeping

BY C. S. GREENE

IT IS important when starting to keep poultry to know about how much time can be devoted to the business and then lay your plans accordingly. Only a few minutes each day are required to care for a small flock of layers, while larger flocks require proportionately more care, and they will not stand neglect, so it is better to understand this point before experience teaches you the lesson for which, perhaps, a high tuition will be charged.

Everything considered, the production of eggs for market offers the best opportunities and most certain profits of any branch of the industry. Under favorable conditions, however, fair profits are sometimes made in the broiler business, the production of soft roasters, crate fattened, and raising turkeys, geese, ducks and pigeons; but each of these different branches is a business of itself and great care should be exercised not to try to establish the second branch until the first has proven successful and profitable. This advice applies to persons who keep small flocks as well as large, for it is not an unusual sight to see ducks, geese, turkeys and chickens all eating out of the same trough and the owner declaring that "poultry don't pay." Under ordinary conditions, then, the egg business is recommended first, and the question which naturally arises is, what is the best way to start and conduct the business successfully? The proper location should be selected first.

In selecting a location for a poultry farm it is necessary to take advantage of natural conditions and resources. Many people fail in the poultry business every year simply because their location is not adapted to the business. To illustrate, it would be folly to breed a fine lot of birds in a low, damp place where disease would be sure to cause serious loss. The ground should be rolling, well drained and of a sandy nature. Low, wet ground will invite all the ills to which poultrydom is heir, so it should be avoided. The slope of the land should be to the south or southeast, and if protected from high winds by woods or hills so much the better. If poultry, meat and eggs are produced for market it is important to choose a location in close proximity to the market selected, so that all produce can be delivered to customers quickly while in the best possible condition and at the least expense for transportation. The proper consideration of these two factors has often made the difference between success and failure. It must also be understood that many poultrymen are producing eggs and meat under the best natural conditions it is possible to find and placing their products on the same markets in competition with yours; so unless you are prepared to successfully meet that competition your profits will be small and perhaps disappear entirely.

The proper breed to keep depends to a great extent upon a person's individual tastes and preferences. As a rule the best breed is the one you like best; but it is necessary at the same time to choose a breed which is naturally adapted to the purposes for which it is intended. For example, if you want large table fowls some of the American or English class of fowls, such as the Plymouth Rocks, Wyandottes or Orpingtons, are excellent for this purpose, while for profitable egg production some of the smaller breeds usually give the best satisfaction. But it must be remembered that there is just as much difference between individual birds of any breed so far as egg production is concerned as there is between the different breeds themselves. It is therefore apparent that the selection of the proper breed is of no more importance than the selection of the proper individuals representing that breed.

The next consideration is the house and yard in which the poultry is to be kept. The house may be of any modern design and as good results may be obtained with one style as with another, so long as they have a good southern or southeastern exposure and are dry, warm, light and well ventilated, with fresh air entering through cloth screens on the south or east side. Cement floors, well drained and covered with sand and litter, are preferred by many of the best poultrymen at the present time. The roof and back should be double, not only to keep the house warm in winter, but also to keep it cool in summer. Practically all kinds of building material is used with good results in the construction of poultry houses.

JESUS THE HEALER*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THOSE who have never had any contact with the dread disease may perhaps best learn of it by reading in Ben Hur, by General Lew Wallace, the story of the mother and her daughter who became lepers. You may thus realize something of the agony of mind and body which lepers suffer. Also you will realize what a blessing the Lord Jesus was to lepers when he was on earth, pitying them, touching them, and healing them. Then take your Bibles and read about Jesus and the lepers in Matt. 8: 3, Matt. 10: 8, Matt. 11: 5, Luke 4: 27, Luke 5: 12, 13, Luke 7: 22, Luke 17: 12-14.

One Sabbath morning, as we were walking from Jerusalem to the Mount of Olives, we passed by a mile of lepers sitting by the roadside with their tin cups for alms standing in front of them. Their cries for help were the most pitiful sounds we have ever heard from human lips. The scene was made the more horrible because tiny children, some of them infants, rolled and played in the dust of the road around their leper parents, themselves not leprous. If Jesus had passed by that day he could have given them healing, and then how changed would have been the scene! Undoubtedly the leper line is there to-day, others having taken the places of those who have died. Shall we say then that the friends of Jesus have no mercy upon lepers? Not so; for in the city of Jerusalem a lepers' home and hospital has been established, and all who will go there will be helped, so it is by choice that they beg by the wayside. But they must pay taxes on their gains! These are collected by the officers of the Turkish Government.

In our lesson to-day we have a very brief story of how Jesus cured a leper, one who was probably sitting by the wayside as Jesus was passing on his tour of the synagogues (Matt. 4: 23). The leper arose and came and knelt down in front of Jesus, plaintively saying: "If thou wilt, thou canst make me clean." Jesus, pitying him, stretched forth his hand, and touched him. That was an unprecedented thing to do, for to touch was to be contaminated. In a strong and sympathetic voice, Jesus replied: "I will; be thou made clean." And it is told that straightway the leprosy departed from him, and he was made clean. "Go, show thyself to the priest, and offer for thy cleansing the things which Moses commanded." (Lev. 14.)

In a recent year, when a service for lepers was being held in a grove for lepers, the Indian pastor preached upon this very incident, and as he was emphasizing the love Jesus had for the leper, a man squat on the ground before him, his knees tucked up under his chin, his arms folded around his knees, face upturned, eyes and mouth wide open, listening to the wondrous story of the love of Jesus, stood it just as long as he could; then he said: "Stop there, preacher. Am I hearing you aright? Are you trying to tell us that there was some one once here upon earth who loved a leper?" "Yes, I am." "Well, who was it?" "Jesus." "Who is he? Where does it tell about him?" "It tells about him in the Bible." "Is that Bible written in Hindustani so that I can read it?" "Yes, and if you care to have a copy, I will gladly give you one." His head fell upon his breast, and he was heard to mutter, "Is not that strange? Some one once loved a leper!" Afterward he said it was the first time he had ever heard of Him who loved the leper. He received his Bible, and used to sit cross-legged with it open on his lap, often surrounded by thirty or forty other lepers who could not read, and in the peculiar sing-song drone which the Hindu priest uses, he would read for hours. (This story is told by the superintendent of the mission to lepers at Allahabad, India.) We are told that later, when a church was built for the lepers, and it was about to be furnished, a committee of the lepers came and said, "Whose church is this?" "It is yours; it is the Lepers' Church." "Well, then," they said, "if it is our church, we want to help; we want to buy a pulpit Bible." "You are welcome to, but I am sure I do not know where you will get the money." They said, "But, sir, we have been praying for this church, and saving for it, so now we want to have a part in it."

In glancing over a map of the world in which countries where leprosy is severe are shown by dark shading, and where it exists in mild form by light shading, we note that China, India, Ceylon, Burma, Siam, Japan, Korea, Sumatra, the Philippine Islands and some portions of South America are generally quite dark, almost black. There are said to be two hundred and fifty thousand lepers in India. In Japan there are known to be twenty-eight thousand families in which leprosy exists. In 1908 forty thousand cases were officially reported. China has almost a countless host of such sufferers. In the Philippine Islands there are two thousand lepers isolated on the Island of Culion, and thousands of others are at large. The United States Government proposes that at length all shall be brought to Culion. Our government has also taken hold of the leprosy situation in Hawaii, known to be the most infected of the Pacific Islands. Considerably more than a million of dollars have been spent to found and carry on a leper colony on Molokai.

In Siam, Malaysia and Korea it is said that this foul disease is destroying thousands. Even in Iceland there are lepers. A well-equipped hospital has been built for them, and there are about one hundred patients, said to be all of the lepers there are in Iceland.

Sympathy and Help for Lepers

As we look over the leprosy map of the world, we do not see any dark shading, but only a very little light shading in either England or the United States. We should fervently thank God for this, and for this reason our hearts should go out to the lepers in other lands. Remembering the compassion of our Lord Jesus for such as they we should, as his friends and followers, do something to help them, first by our prayers and then by our gifts.

One day a beautiful girl seventeen years of age was brought in her white bridal clothes to a leper asylum by her brother. As she looked at the lepers she put her head on her brother's shoulder and wept aloud, saying: "Am I to be like one of these?" One of the teachers said: "Miss Francis, you have had opportunities in life. Would you not take a class of these little children and women, and try to teach them some of the things you know?" (She had been trained in a Christian orphanage, and had become tainted with leprosy, which had not been discovered until just about the time she was to be married.) She consented to take the class, and her teachings wrought a wonderful change among the inmates. Instead of being slovenly, they came to be neat and tidy. At length Miss Francis was able to say: "Every day I thank God that he made me a leper, because by doing so he has given me an opportunity to work for him that I would not have had in any other way."

America's New Dairy Industry

THOSE experts who have been, at the request of the United States Government, investigating the milch goat industries of Europe have returned fully convinced that the dairy industry of America is to have a real rival in the milch goat. It is their belief that America will within a few years be producing fancy cheese similar to that which is now made only in France, Switzerland and Germany. Switzerland grew to prosperity on her dairying industries, in which the goat has played a very large part. Germany has followed the Swiss example and the milch goat industry is now valued at over $60,000,000 a year. France has not been far behind in adopting the milch goat for dairy use, and Austria, Italy and Spain have already well-established goat dairies.

It is not alone in the profit of the industry that its interest centres. Some authorities consider the milch goat to be entirely immune to tuberculosis, which often attacks cattle, and physicians have long regarded its milk as a superior food for infants and invalids. Immigration from European countries has brought the goat a certain amount of popularity in this country, though as yet the dairies are operated on a comparatively small scale. Those who have become used to the use of goat's milk in Europe consider it almost a hardship to be compelled to return to the use of cow's milk. They claim that the milk of the goat is richer, more nutritious and more palatable than that of the cow and has in addition superior keeping qualities. Used in cooking, its superiority to cow's milk is said to be quickly apparent both to sight and taste.

The experts of the Department of Agriculture are convinced that the solution of America's future milk problem lies in the proper introduction of the milch goat. They believe that when the American farmer learns that from five to ten goats can be kept at the same cost as one cow, that the goats can be pastured upon land which would be otherwise entirely useless, and that they will produce almost twice as much milk as a cow, the goat industry will be taken up with a great deal of interest. The figures reported by the various investigators who have been looking into the subject in Europe bear out the conclusions which have just been stated.

The government is making the first attempt to introduce European milch goats on a large scale. Part of the large tract of land near Washington, D. C., which was recently set apart for the use of the Bureau of Animal Industries is to be used as a goat dairy farm. There is already a large herd of American goats installed and it is hoped that by cross-breeding these with the best European varieties some new and highly valuable breeds may be produced. The average record of the present American goat is about two quarts of milk per day, while many of the Swiss goats give as high as five or six quarts a day, and the average among Swiss thoroughbreds is about four quarts. German writers upon the dairying industry assert that the milch goats of that country give ten times their body weight in milk each year and that exceptional specimens have given eighteen times their weight.

The French Government has done a great deal to encourage goat dairying, the milk being used for the manufacture of cheese. It is stated that 12,000 goats are kept for this purpose upon an estate near Lyons. The cheese which is produced under these conditions is already well known in this country. Americans are familiar with it by the names of Roquefort, Ricotto, Schweitzer, Altenburg, St. Marcellin and Gratarion. The area of the United States which is accessible for the goat industry is very large. There are practically only a few sections of the dampest lowlands where its development is impossible. Great tracts of the New England and Southern highlands which now lie idle will form ideal pastures for goats, while the Southwestern uplands and southern California will have an additional advantage in that their warmer climate will permit the rearing of the Nubian milch goat, which is the greatest milk producer of all the breeds. Goat's milk will have to overcome the preconceived idea of many Americans that it possesses an unpleasant odor and taste. But this will not be difficult when it is proved that any unpleasantness is entirely due to careless dairying methods and that the same slovenliness if followed in the management of a dairy of milch cows would have equally bad results upon the product.

Ice and Economics

FASTER steamers and more steamers, trading between our northern ports and the tropics, have had no effect on our climate, but they assuredly have had on the character of our food and on our general comfort. Fifty years ago oranges, bananas and cocoanuts were luxuries known only to our more favored seaports; to-day these, and even more perishable kinds of tropical fruits, are to be had at reasonable prices in little railroad towns a thousand miles from the coast. Cities, quick transportation has had much to do in bringing this about, but methods of preservation through artificial refrigeration have had more. The old-time farmer exhausted his ingenuity in preserving the products of summer and autumn against the destructive frosts of winter; but now all this is changed, and the farmer, like the larger dealer, is using the rigid forces of winter to keep fresh and wholesome the most delicate as well as the hardier products of the farm.

The ice-king's realm is no longer confined to the north, nor are his adherents limited to the luxurious city dweller. Man has learned the monarch's secret, and is producing ice at sea-level under the equator, or transporting it south on the same ships that carry the tropical fruits to the north. Ice has become one of the most important factors in the economics of living, and the farmer, usually so conservative, has come to realize this, and to use the knowledge to his own great advantage. Ice, once regarded as an incumbrance, or at best as something for the young folks to skate on, has become an essential to the farmer who marches abreast of the times; and the ice-house, although necessarily never the most conspicuous, has become one of the most important structures on the farm.

that people may easily take from those who have it, and that it makes people very ugly to look at. It will not be a difficult matter to arouse the interest of the children in the hundreds and hundreds of little boys and girls whose fathers and mothers are lepers, especially when the children are told that if the leper children are kept away from their parents and put into schools, they will probably never have leprosy. Tell them how the children of missionaries sometimes lovingly put their arms around these children and have them for playmates. Tell how Jesus loved and helped the lepers. Also the story of the leper and the Bible might be told to them, but not the story of Miss Francis. That is much too sad for them to hear, and quite beyond their comprehension.

Gulf Coast Country of Texas and Louisiana

could send you, for down there men make good. Why do you stay in the city, cooped up in factory or shop waiting for a younger man to get your job? Don't you realize that in the city your salary or wages stop when you quit work?

In the Gulf Coast Country of Texas and Louisiana the whim or malice of no boss will jeopardize your income. When you are ready to turn the reins over to a younger man you will be able to take life easy. Why not lead a healthful, outdoor life on your own farm and put money in the bank.

Investigate This Wonderful Country

The trip down there, via the Frisco, is worth the little cost of going. On the first and third Tuesdays of each month, round trip fares, via the Frisco Lines, to the Gulf Coast Country of Texas and Louisiana are very low. From Chicago, $37.50; from St. Louis and Kansas City, $32.50; Birmingham, $37.50; New Orleans and Baton Rouge, $20.00 or less. To many points fares are even less.

The Frisco Lines operate splendid, electric lighted, all steel trains, daily, from Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City, Birmingham and New Orleans. Every day of the year these trains carry through cars to the Gulf Coast Country, and on excursion days tourist sleepers.

The Universal Refuge*

GOD is my refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will I not fear," wrote the Psalmist.

The great contribution of the Jewish race, the "chosen people," to religion and civilization is their vivid conception of God. It is true that their thought of him was marred by an admixture of human attributes which Jesus cleared away; but, on the whole, the grandeur of the Hebrew Jehovah, his holiness, his justice, his love, has brooded over our feverish, petty human history, like a great Ideal, such as an inspired painter might take for a model. God is a "shield," a "glory"; "salvation belongeth unto him"; he is a "refuge in time of trouble"; "his loving kindness is marvelous"; he is a "fortress," a "rock," a "buckler"; "the horn of my salvation and my high tower"; "my strength and my redeemer."

These are only a few of the noble figures with which the Hebrew poets made real to the people the existence of a spiritual God, a God utterly different from the degraded deities worshiped by the tribes around them. The justice of their conception has been vindicated by the long procession of the generations. To those who put their trust in him, and who have shown that trust by a striving after the righteousness of life which the true worship of the Hebrew God involves, he has ever been a sure retreat "from every stormy wind that blows."

In one of the great Roman palaces, on a ceiling, is painted that most wonderful picture of Guido Reni, the "Aurora." Few can long contemplate this fascinating work of art in its inconvenient position; but a horizontal mirror has been so constructed as to reflect the picture perfectly, and thus one may feast one's eyes upon it easily for hours at a time. In the same way, though we may find the abstract thought of God hard to grasp, the vivid comparisons of the Psalmist and the prophets make his character clear to us, and guided by them we can "hide ourselves in the secret of his pavilion" when trouble comes.

In one of George Matheson's eloquent appeals to Christ, he says, "Thou comest to me when I am still in the shadow. It is on a soiled finger thou puttest the adoption ring; it is on a broken body thou layest the best robe. Thy voice says to me, 'Take another chance. Try once more.'" So he speaks to every discouraged soul among us.

Testimony That Counts

IT HAS been said that no great prophet or poet is understood by the mass of the people until those chosen ones appear who can translate his true meaning to them. "Ye are his witnesses," the inspired seer tells us. It is through his children, to whose hearts the vision hath been granted, that the outside world is to learn the real nature of Christ and be drawn to him. Let us see to it that our witness is true.

The testimony of the word is important, but the testimony of the life is vital. Though we speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not love in our hearts and virtue in our conduct, our fine talk is as tinkling brass. No two people are formed exactly alike, no two are equally fitted for the same service; but our work is accepted if each one of us does his best to show forth the love of Christ.

To the modest and humble soul, it often seems as though no progress were being made, no good being done. So it seemed to little Pippa in Browning's great poem, "Pippa Passes." She felt that her holiday, which opened so brightly, drew to "a drear, dark close." She had wished to do some good, but did not see that she had accomplished any; while, quite unknown to herself, she had brought a murderer to remorse; a mock marriage to reality; a traitor to loyalty; and an assassin to justice. Good, pure, singing her innocent, uplifting songs as she passed along, she had done more in a day than many an older Christian does in years.

It is a parable for us all, and especially in its lesson that we must not expect always to see the reward of our efforts. In another world it may be revealed to us, but here we must be content to do our work as well as we can, bearing our testimony by word of mouth whenever a chance comes, and making chances, by the grace of God.

A little Chinese boy who had been to a mission school did many errands for his mother and the neighbors, and always brought back the right change. A heathen woman asked a neighbor one day how she dared to trust the little fellow with so much money. "Oh," she said, "he goes to the Jesus church. He will never cheat."

There was the kind of testimony that tells. The members of that church, by establishing a character for truthfulness and fidelity in the community, had done as great a work as could be done there for Christ.

Mr. Moody was never weary of praising the great testimony of Paul. Surely it was inspired of God.

"Think of Paul up yonder," said the great evangelist on one occasion. "I can imagine men going up to him and saying, 'Paul, I thank you for writing that letter to the Ephesians. I found Christ in that.' 'Paul, I thank you for writing that epistle to the Corinthians.' 'Paul, I found Christ in that epistle to the Galatians.' For when Paul was put in prison, he did not fold his hands and sit down in idleness. No, he began to write, and his epistles have brought thousands to a knowledge of Christ."

There is always a way to bear testimony if we are really anxious to do it. One of our poets has described a successful testimony, which must always contain a union of head-wisdom and heart-wisdom, in these beautiful words:

How shall the Word be preached with power?
Ah, needless to debate and plan!
Heart answereth unto heart in man:
Out of the very life of each
Must come the power to heal or teach.
The life all eloquent may grieve,
The brain may subtly work and weave:
But if the heart take not its share,
The word of power is wanting there.

Arizona Becomes a State

AS THE White House clocks were striking ten on the morn of February 14, President Taft signed the proclamation that admitted Arizona to Statehood in the Union. "There you are," said the President, as he signed the document which added the forty-eighth star to the flag, and brought within the sisterhood of the States the last bit of territory within continental United States. During the signing of the parchment the President's office was filled with officers of the new State, government officials and others who were vitally interested. The moving picture men and photographers were allowed places on each side of the desk, so that the camera might play its part as our greatest modern historian.

GENERAL NOTES

—JOSEPH LISTER, first Baron Lister, who was made famous by his discovery of the antiseptic system of treatment in surgery, died in London, England, on February 11. He was born in 1827, and had served as professor of surgery in Glasgow and Edinburgh Universities and in King's College, London.

—IT HAS BEEN announced from Washington that Secretary Knox is about to make a diplomatic tour of the South and Central American republics. It is predicted that this journey will strengthen the bond of sympathy between the United States and the smaller republics of the American continent. Secretary Knox is a thoroughgoing believer in the Monroe Doctrine, and thinks that if we are really going to act as big brother to these less populous and less stable nations, we should keep in touch with them and be ready to give them substantial aid in case of need.

—DURING THE recent cold wave, the Bowery Mission Bread Line has averaged over 1,000 men and youths nightly. Many of these poor, homeless fellows were wretchedly clad, and welcomed the warmth of the Mission and the midnight meal. It costs 2½ cents to feed a man in the Bread Line, and as these men and boys are honest and worthy unemployed from different parts of the country, who have become stranded in New York in the hunt for work, their case is one which appeals to universal sympathy. In giving to the Bowery Mission Bread Line, the contributors are helping a deserving cause especially at this inclement season.

—GENERAL JAMES B. WEAVER, who was the presidential candidate of the Populist Party in 1892, and of the Greenback Labor Party in 1880, died at the home of relatives in Des Moines, Ia., on February 12. He was seventy-nine years old. General Weaver was born in Dayton, O., June 12, 1833. After receiving his law degree, in 1856, he began to practice in Bloomfield, Ia. At the outbreak of the Civil War he enlisted as a private, but later was commissioned as a first lieutenant. In October, 1862, he was commissioned major of the regiment and promoted to be colonel soon after, when his superior officers were killed at the battle of Corinth. On March 13, 1864, he was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers for gallantry. After the war he held office until 1873, and in 1878, having left the Republican Party, he supported the Greenback candidate for governor, and in the following year was elected a representative in Congress. The financial measures he brought forward made him the logical candidate of the Greenback Party in the presidential campaign of 1880, but after a crushing defeat, he retired from public life until the Populist movement.

"The Center of Population"

A Title that Fits Every Bell Telephone

From the census of 1910 it is found that the center of population is in Bloomington, Indiana, latitude 39 degrees 10 minutes 12 seconds north, and longitude 86 degrees 32 minutes 20 seconds west.

"If all the people in the United States were to be assembled in one place, the center of population would be the point which they could reach with the minimum aggregate travel, assuming that they all traveled in direct lines from their residence to the meeting place."

—U. S. Census Bulletin.

This description gives a word picture of every telephone in the Bell system.

Every Bell telephone is the center of the system.

It is the point which can be reached with "the minimum aggregate travel," by all the people living within the range of telephone transmission and having access to Bell telephones.

Wherever it may be on the map, each Bell telephone is a center for purposes of intercommunication.

To make each telephone the center of communication for the largest number of people, there must be One System, One Policy and Universal Service for a country of more than ninety million.

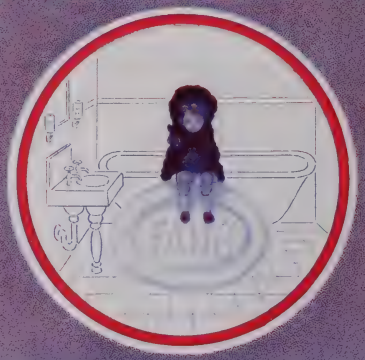
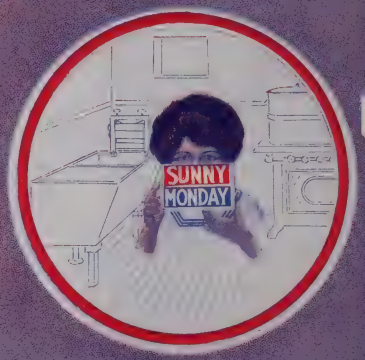
FAIRBANK'S SOAPS





Gold Dust

Germs of today accumulate on oft-used pots and pans, and ordinary soap and water only cleans off the surface.

Gold Dust does the work—and does it right. It digs deep after germs, cleans like a new whistle and leaves your pots and pans as new and as bright as the day they were new—and sanitarily safe.

Gold Dust does this work in just half the time required by soap or any other cleanser. Does it better, too.

Gold Dust cleans everything like magic.

¶ Use Gold Dust for washing dishes, scrubbing floors, cleaning pots and pans, woodwork, bathtubs and fixtures, sinks, refrigerators, etc., softening hard water, washing clothes and making the finest soft soap.

"Let the Gold Dust Twins do your work"

Fairy Soap

If we could only place a cake of Fairy Soap in your bathroom, we could at once prove its superiority over other white soaps.

Fairy is made from better materials—is white and stays white; it has a dainty, agreeable odor, rather than a "soapy" one; its handy, oval shape and floating properties add the finishing touches to its perfection in quality.

To use Fairy Soap once is to use it always.

¶ We could charge you five times the five cents asked for Fairy Soap, but we could add nothing to the quality. In higher priced soaps you are paying for fancy wrappers and expensive perfume—not better soap.

"Have you a little 'Fairy' in your home?"

Sunny Monday
Laundry Soap

The ordinary yellow laundry soap shrinks blankets and woolen goods—Sunny Monday Soap does not. The reason is that Sunny Monday is made from a high grade of choice fats and vegetable oils—and possesses a wonderful dirt-starting ingredient which saves half the rubbing.

You will find that the use of Sunny Monday Soap will add just about 100% to the life of your blankets, woolen goods and finer fabrics.

¶ Because of its purity and whiteness and because it starts the dirt so quickly, one bar of Sunny Monday Soap will go as far and do as much work as two bars of ordinary yellow laundry soap.

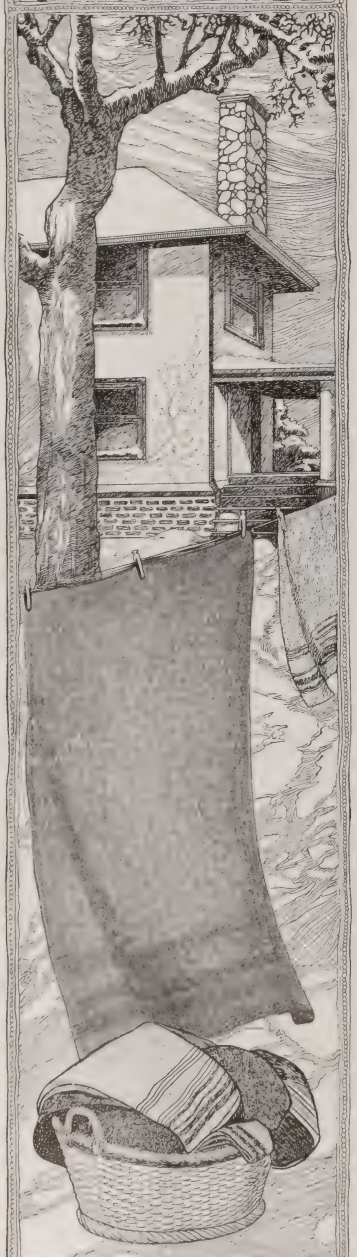
IVORY SOAP IN THE LAUNDRY

THE WASHING OF WOOLENS AND BLANKETS



THE careful housewife asks: "How can I wash woolens without shrinking them?"

Her problem is not only to get the woolens clean but to keep the youngsters' under-garments to their original length, the blankets to their first generous proportions and all other woolens to the same size as when new.

To prevent shrinking you first should know what causes it — what you should not do.

1st. Rubbing mats the woolen fibers. That means shrinking. Therefore, you should not rub bar soap on any article made wholly or partially of wool; nor should you rub the article on the washboard.

2nd. Sudden changes of temperature draw the fibers together. That means shrinking. Therefore, you should not use very hot or very cold water, either for washing or rinsing; nor hang the articles out-doors in very cold weather; nor let woolen dress goods dry before pressing.

3rd. Strong soaps and strong alkalies contract, stiffen and weaken the fibers. That means shrinking. It means more. It means their destruction. Therefore, you should not use any other than Ivory Soap because it has no "free" alkali—is 99 44/100 Per Cent. Pure.

To enable you to avoid shrinking your woolens, and at the same time to wash them clean, is the purpose of the following directions. Keep them for ready reference. They will eliminate worry and save wool.

The Procter & Gamble Co.

Blankets Choose a bright, sunny day with a moderate breeze. Have plenty of warm water handy.

Make enough Ivory Soap Paste (see directions below) to wash all the blankets; from a half to a whole cake of Ivory Soap (small size) for each pair. Hard water and large, heavy blankets require two or three times as much soap as soft water and small, light blankets.

Fill three tubs about half full of warm — not hot — water. To the first add enough Ivory Soap Paste to make a good, foamy suds. Put in one double or two single blankets. Let them soak thirty minutes. Work them up and down, adding Ivory Soap Paste as needed. (See description of "Baby" Washing Machine, below). To remove spots, do not lift the blanket from the water, but put one hand under the spot and brush with Ivory Soap Paste. Use a moderately stiff brush.

To the second tub, add half as much Ivory Soap Paste as to the first. Put in blankets and repeat the lifting and "sousing".

To the third tub, add just enough Ivory Soap Paste to make the water milky. Run blankets into this tub through loosely adjusted wringer. Rinse, wring lightly and hang in open air at once — white blankets in sun, colored blankets in shade.

When dry, go over them with a soft, flannel cloth or a clean whisk broom and hang near a stove or in a warm room for several hours.

Woolen Under-Garments (Flannels) To half a tub of warm water, add enough Ivory Soap Paste to make a good suds. If the garment is soiled, add half a tablespoonful of ammonia for each gallon of water. Soak the garment ten minutes. Then draw it through the hands, work it up and down and squeeze it. Do not rub soap on it or rub it on the washboard.

Run through the wringer. Turn garment inside out and put it through a second suds of the same temperature as the first. If any spot remains, lay garment on a table and brush the spot with a little Ivory Soap Paste.

Rinse garment quickly through several waters of same temperature as the first water. If you rinse with hard water, soften it with a little Ivory Soap Paste.

Put garment through wringer again or squeeze the water out. Then shake and hang to dry in a warm place — not where the garment will steam.

When nearly dry, press flannels on the wrong side with a moderately warm iron. Ribbed underwear should be gently stretched into shape as it dries — not ironed.

Soak colored flannels in warm salt water before washing.

Woolen Dress Goods Follow the same directions as for flannels. If you are not sure that the color is "fast", wash a sample and dry it. If the color runs, try to set it with a solution of salt, white vinegar, borax or alum, one level tablespoonful to a gallon of water.

Wring loosely from one water to the other. If the material wrinkles badly, take it from the last water without wringing and hang by the edge to dry.

Put over the ironing sheet a cover of cotton cloth of fast color, about the same shade as the material to be ironed. While still damp, put the material on the table, wrong side up, and iron till perfectly dry with a warm — not hot — iron.

Then air the material and it will look like new. Roll, but do not fold it.

Sweaters, Knitted Goods, Etc. Wash the same as flannels except that only one rinsing is usually necessary.

If very loosely woven, put them in a pillow-case or cheese-cloth bag so that they will not be stretched in washing. If no bag is used, slip a towel under them to remove them from the tub. In this way you lift them out without stretching them.

Dry miscellaneous knit goods by putting them in a heap on a cloth-covered chair near an open window or in the shade outdoors if the weather is not too cold.

Throw the sleeves of a sweater over the back of a chair while the body of the garment lies on the chair seat.

Turn all garments frequently so they will dry evenly.

When nearly dry press on wrong side with a moderately warm iron.

Before washing colored knit goods, "set" the colors by soaking in warm salt water.

How to Force Suds through Blankets and Woolens without Rubbing

A "Baby" Washing Machine Get a good-sized tin funnel; price ten or fifteen cents. Have the tinner punch two rows of holes in it, one above the other, near the edge and about as large as a pea. Plug the funnel with a cork. Fit a wooden handle to the neck or cover it with a cloth so it can be handled easily. Then you have a "Baby" Washing Machine. Apply it to garments as they lie in the tub. The up and down movement of the funnel will force the suds through the material. The garment will be cleansed thoroughly, without injury to the fibers and with hardly any effort on your part.

How to Make Ivory Soap Paste

Shave one large cake of Ivory Soap into three quarts of water, or two small cakes into four quarts. Do this with a knife, vegetable grater or food chopper. Keep nearly, but not quite, at boiling point for about fifteen minutes, until the soap is thoroughly dissolved. When cool, it will be like jelly. Keep in a china or glass jar with tight-fitting top. Use as needed. We cannot emphasize too strongly the value of Ivory Soap Paste, not only in the laundry, but in the kitchen, the nursery and for general household use.

Next Month's Advertisement of Ivory Soap will deal with its uses at Housecleaning Time.

The Priests of the Shrine

A Japanese Winter Festival

BY MATTHIAS KLEIN

SUMOTO, JAPAN

IT WAS not yet three o'clock in the morning and the chill January wind whipped around the little headland and started the sparks from our blazing campfire in all directions. Yet cold and early as it was, it seemed that all Japan had turned out for its midwinter festival. At Sumoto our workers, with some of the native Christians, were making this strange gathering of the people, both from the interior and the seacoast, an opportunity to carry the Gospel to the shepherdless multitudes. Gathered around our fire near the gateway of the shrine to which the crowds were going, we drew the people toward this "pre-sunrise" service with songs and prayers which were new to the ears of many of them.

The unsightly old shrine that had gathered this crowd of holiday-makers is located almost in a wilderness region, quite isolated from the villages and towns, yet young and old, farmer and fisherman, come each year at this season for special service to propitiate its goddess. The women are specially represented among the devotees; one is troubled about a forlorn or wayward son or daughter, another has a drunken husband or has had a serious disagreement with her neighbors; the young woman in search of a suitor, the widows, the divorced and the childless all come with their pleas and their expectations. The younger generation, not so religiously inclined, come for the sake of the outing and the chance of making holiday which the Japanese as a people never let escape them. Aged and feeble parents, who could not come alone, offer splendid excuses for the young to gather for a day of festivities. Many of the visitors to the shrine make their appearance long before it is gray daylight, believing that those who arrive first will secure the best of the blessings.

The presiding goddess is the deified Empress Jingo who, history says, in the second century of the Christian era made war upon Korea and subjected it to Japan. Around this expedition, which is in itself quite reasonable, there has gathered a great web of legend and tradition. Tradition says that she was aided in her great undertaking by the prime minister, Takeuchi, who lived three hundred and sixty years, serving six successive emperors, and who in return now has his picture on every one yen bill. Legend tells us that the Empress Jingo was empowered and protected on the seas by three sea-gods and subsequently these shrines, called Sunniyoshi, have been erected to her.

Many of the devotees of the shrines are from the seacoast and make their living as fishermen. These men are intensely superstitious, and like all in the East they are fatalists. They argue that as they may not approach the sea-gods themselves, it is wise for them to make their peace and become firm friends of this deity who has such influence with the spirits of the deep. The subtle or savage gods of the sea allowed her, in spite of distant and perilous waters, to take her faithful warriors in the frailest of craft to Korea, to crush her foe, and to return safely to her native shores. This conqueress is, in the eyes of the peasants and fisher-folk, not only the medium of great blessings, but their very fountain. The fishermen eagerly seek her benediction on their trackless journeys, for their lives, which are not without hardships and danger, are made the more miserable by their fear that some act of theirs has invoked the vengeance of the sea-gods and that when the storms arise and the thick fogs creep up on the coast it is no use for them to struggle against the fate that has gripped them.

Yet their lives are not all fogs and storms, for on summer mornings, even before the first pink blush of sunrise, whole fleets of their little boats, each manned by two or three stalwart fishermen, creep through the placid waters, out of the rivers and inlets to the ocean. Though the fishermen have just gone through the farewell to wife and children, which is almost a ceremony, they bend their backs to the oars and accompany their long, swinging stroke with the funa-uta (sailor song) that puts energy into the work and cheers the spirits, too. To Western ears these sailor songs have little musical quality, and do not at all resemble the rollicking choruses which we associate with sailors and fishermen. Often when the notes, coming from a distance, wake the uninitiated ear from its morning slumbers they will be mistaken for the solitary piping of a quail.

The returning fisherman is no thankless worshiper, for no sooner does he reach shore than he offers his doxology for protection. He has already disposed of his business affairs and is at liberty to visit the shrine. For as soon as his square sampan sail rounds the quaint headland which brings him into his home harbor, he is in his market. He completes his sales on board his boat and is thus enabled, before his feet touch shore, to enjoy the comfortable feeling that the reward of his trip is snugly tucked away in his obi.

The Judge Before a Judge

TEXT: "Art thou a king then?" John 18: 37

LET us note two reasons why we should give special consideration to questions that were put to Jesus: Because they are nearly all on things that deeply concern us, and because he speaks "as one having authority." When some temple officers were sent to arrest him, and were asked, as they returned without him, "Why have ye not brought him?" they answered, "Never man spake like this man" (John 7: 46). With so many of his utterances before us, we can see that even more clearly than it was seen when those officers made their report. No trial has ever been held of such universal interest as the trial of Jesus Christ. Another of equal interest will not be held until Pilate and Jesus change places as Judge on the bench and prisoner at the bar. We shall all stand, with Pilate, before that judgment seat, and each "give account of himself to God."

Events That Led to This Trial

There were several attempts to kill Jesus during his brief public ministry. The last and successful plot was by the Jewish ecclesiastical court. That body was not all of one mind about Jesus. John 7: 51 shows that Nicodemus was not with the majority, and his conduct later, as also that of Joseph of Arimathea, shows that those two members of the council believed in Jesus. The resurrection of Lazarus was the act of Jesus that led the council to determine that he should die. They said, "This man doeth many miracles." They also said, "If we let him alone all men will believe on him, and the Romans will come and take away both our place and nation." It is evident that they were not all of one mind then, from the remarks of Caiaphas the high priest. He said, "Ye know nothing at all; nor consider that it is expedient for us, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not." Their reasons for wanting to kill Jesus were chiefly political. In not a few cases since then, officials have failed to stand for right and righteousness, because they have thought their political interests would thus be imperiled.

John makes a significant comment on the words of Caiaphas when he says, "This spake he not of himself, but being high priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation, and . . . gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad." We all know what Caiaphas meant, but we also know that what he prophesied had an application that he did not see. Jesus did die for that people, and for all peoples, of every age and clime. In Matt. 16: 21 he had told his disciples "that he must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day." And also on the night before he was crucified he said to them, "It is expedient for you that I go away"; and he had told them, as we have seen, how he was to go. He was "lifted up" on the cross, as he had predicted. John 11: 47-53 will repay careful reading and comparison with other records of the trial of Jesus.

A Record of Momentous Events

Because of the action of the Jewish council, "Jesus walked no more openly among the Jews, but went . . . to Ephraim, and there remained with his disciples." Ephraim was in Judea, about twenty miles northeast of Jerusalem. Jesus was there in concealment, with his disciples, probably five or six weeks. No doubt he taught his disciples many things that the Holy Spirit brought to their remembrance after he was gone from them. He had said to them, "My time is not yet come." He foresaw the order of events that were to take place, and warned and comforted his disciples. Read John 16: 19, 20.

The last three verses of John 11 tell us that "the Jews' passover was nigh at hand." There was much speculation as to whether Jesus would be at that feast. "The chief priests and the Pharisees had given a commandment that if any man knew where he was, he should show it, that they might take him." When Jesus left Ephraim for Jerusalem, he and his disciples first went north through Samaria. Luke 17: 11 says (in the American Revised Version), "It came to pass as they were on the way to Jerusalem, that he was passing along the borders of Samaria and Galilee." They moved east across the Jordan, and down the caravan road to the fords of Jericho, where they recrossed into Judea, Jesus teaching and working miracles along the way. On his way from the Jordan to Jericho he gave sight to Bartimeus and another blind man, and on his way "through Jericho," had that remarkable interview and visit with Zaccheus, the Roman tax-collector.

"Then Jesus six days before the passover came to Bethany." That was on Friday. The Jewish Sabbath began at six that evening and closed at six the next evening. "There they made him a supper, and Martha served; but Lazarus was" a guest with Jesus. That supper was at "the house of Simon the leper"; no doubt a leper whom Jesus had healed. It was at that supper that Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus, broke that alabaster box of ointment, "very precious, and anointed the feet of Jesus"—a deed for which she had prepared; for Jesus said, "Against the day of my burying hath she kept this." Of course news of that supper reached the chief priests, and "they consulted that they might put Lazarus also to death, because that by reason of him many of the Jews believed in Jesus."

"On the next day," Sunday, Jesus rode in triumph into Jerusalem. The people spread their garments on the roadway before him, "and branches of palm trees . . . and cried, Hosanna; blessed is the King of Israel that cometh in the name of the Lord." He went directly to the temple, cleansed it, taught through the day, and went back to Bethany at night with his disciples. He went to the city again and taught on Monday, and out to Bethany at night, and also on Tuesday. Wednesday he spent at Bethany. Thursday morning he sent Peter and John to the city to secure "a large upper room," and prepare for the passover supper; and "when the hour was come he sat down with the twelve." John's account of that night is very full. It is a remarkable record. It begins with the thirteenth chapter and extends to the twenty-eighth verse of the eighteenth chapter.

False Witnesses

A meeting of the council was held at the palace of the high priest, "where they consulted that they might take Jesus by subtilty and kill him"; but they said, "Not on the feast day, lest there be an uproar among the people." Judas Iscariot had seen some of them prior to the feast day, and "they had covenanted to give him money," to tell them how to take Jesus. During the passover supper, before the institution of our Lord's Supper, Judas went out to betray him to the Jews. About midnight Jesus "went forth with his disciples over the brook Kedron," and into the garden of Gethsemane. "Judas also knew the place." To that place he led "a band of men and officers from the chief priests and Pharisees," and went "straightway to him and said, Master, Master, and kissed him." That was the sign he had agreed upon with the chief priests. It was "the Judas kiss." That phrase has come down to us because it is so significant. The officers took Jesus to the palace of the high priest, and first to Annas, the father-in-law of Caiaphas. He asked Jesus about his doctrines and disciples, and then "sent him bound unto Caiaphas," probably to another part of the same palace. The high priest had hired a couple of "false witnesses" to testify against Jesus, but he paid no attention to their foolish charge. Caiaphas then said, "I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou art the Christ, the Son of God." He answered (Mark 14: 62), "I am," and added that remarkable prophecy, "Ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." That was enough for those who had determined to kill him, and the high priest said, "What need we any further witnesses?" "And they all condemned him to be worthy of death." Under Jewish law a blasphemer was to be stoned to death. They charged him with speaking blasphemy, because he claimed to be the Son of God; a just charge if he was not the Son of God. But it was a charge made in the face of overwhelming evidence that he was what he claimed to be.

They had no authority to execute a death penalty, and so as soon as it was day "they led him away to Pilate." They sent Jesus into the judgment hall, and Pilate went out to inquire what charge they had to make against this man. They said, "If he were not a malefactor [an evil-doer] we would not bring him to thee." They knew better than to make the charge of blasphemy to Pilate, but even he would not condemn a man on such an indefinite charge as they made. He said, "Take ye him and judge him according to your law." They replied, "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death." They then charged him with sedition, saying, "We found this fellow perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that he himself is Christ a king." Then Pilate examined him, but reported that he found no fault in him. But they were more fierce, saying, "He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place." Hearing of Galilee, Pilate thought he saw a way to get the case off from his hands, and so he sent him to Herod Antipas, who was then in the city. Herod was glad to see Jesus, but could get nothing out of him, and so sent him back to Pilate.

The True Witness

Pilate said, "Ye have brought this man to me as one that perverteth the people, and I, having examined him, have found no fault; . . . no, nor yet Herod, for I sent you to him, and nothing worthy of death is done unto him." He therefore proposed to release him, but they clamored for his crucifixion.

Now turn to John 18: 33-36, and note the dialogue between Pilate and Jesus. First Pilate asked him, "Art thou the king of the Jews?" Jesus said, "My kingdom is not of this world," etc. It is not composed of states and nations like the Roman Empire. Then Pilate asks the question we use as our text, "Art thou a king then?" Jesus answers that question in language that should have prayerful consideration. He was born as a man, and came into this world, from the Father, "to bear witness to the truth." Not to make truth, for it is not made, but is as eternal as God. He also states that whosoever is after the truth listens to him. In the realm of spiritual truth Jesus is a King; the King of kings, and Lord of lords, and of all who listen to him.

Paul says, "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; . . . neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." Pilate heard what Jesus said, and asked, "What is truth?" but he did it with no intention of waiting for an answer. He regarded Jesus as a harmless philosopher, and turned away to say to the Jews again, "I find in him no fault." And yet he delivered him to be crucified. Let us ask the Great Teacher, "What is truth?" in a very different spirit from that manifested by Pilate. He bears witness to the truth about God; about man in his relations to God, and to his fellow men; and about the future. "God is a Spirit, and seeketh such to worship him as worship in spirit and in truth." He is "our Father who art in heaven." He loves us as a Father, as Jesus shows in the parable of the Prodigal Son. True repentance brings forgiveness.

Redeemer and Brother

The fatherhood of God involves the brotherhood of the human family. "All ye are brethren." We are a fallen, but also a redeemed race. Our Redeemer is also our brother. He knows all about us, and has come to show us the way of salvation. He bears witness to the truth about the future. In an important sense our future is in our own hands. We may hear his voice and live, or disregard his "witness to the truth" and remain in our lost condition. He says, "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory, and before him shall be gathered all nations, and he shall separate them one from another as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats." It is for us to say whether we will hear him say to us, "Come," or "Depart." Let us take these things seriously, and act wisely. Let our prayer be,

> O God, mine inmost soul convert,
> And deeply on my thoughtful heart
> Eternal things impress;
> Give me to feel their solemn weight,
> And tremble on the brink of fate,
> And wake to righteousness.

In Memoriam. Passed away March 7, 1910

IN LOVING kindness God all things does guide,
And points the path to everlasting peace,
While yet in tender care that shall not cease
His spirit comes with mortals to abide—
The Holy Spirit, whose surpassing love
Is borne unto their fellows by those men
Whom God appoints unto this service, when
He gives to earth a vision from above.

One of these messengers of God was he
Whose gentle soul found multitude of ways
The balm of Heaven's love on earth to give;
Whose helpful heart o'erflowed with sympathy,
Whose chiefest aim was all mankind to raise,
Whose noble works throughout all time must live!

Churches and the Homeless

IT IS a cheering sign to note the readiness with which a number of the leading New York churches have responded to the invitation of the Bowery Mission to help in the work of sheltering the homeless during the present phenomenally severe winter—the coldest in many years. When the mercury went down below zero, it became an urgent problem for the Mission how to provide shelter for the thousands of homeless and unemployed, who were compelled to pass the nights in the freezing atmosphere of the streets. The appeal was made to the generosity of the churches, with the result that the following cordially co-operated in providing beds for many hundreds of the destitute:

Grace Church—Rev. Dr. C. L. Slattery, rector, 419 East Thirteenth Street; Rev. George L. Bottome, curate.

Trinity Church—Rev. Dr. W. T. Manning, rector, 187 Fulton Street.

St. Bartholomew's—Rev. Leighton Parks, rector, 23 East Thirty-eighth Street.

Calvary Church—Rev. Mr. Sedgwick, Fourth Avenue and Twenty-first Street.

St. Thomas's P. E. Church—Rev. Dr. Ernest M. Stires, rector, 3 West Fifty-third Street.

Church of the Ascension—Rev. Dr. Percy Stickney Grant. Rev. A. F. Underhill, 12 West Eleventh Street.

Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church—Rev. Henry Sloan Coffin, pastor, 41 East Seventy-third Street.

St. Nicholas Dutch Reformed Church, Forty-eighth Street and Fifth Avenue—Rev. Malcolm James McLeod, pastor.

First German M. E. Church, Forty-eighth Street—Mark's Place, Rev. John Lange.

Madison Avenue Baptist Church — Rev. Charles A. Eaton, pastor, 30 East Thirty-first Street.

Madison Avenue M. E. Church—Rev. Wallace MacMullen, pastor, 46 East Sixtieth Street.

Central Presbyterian Church—Rev. Wilton Merle Smith, pastor, 29 West Fifty-fourth Street.

West End Collegiate Church—Rev. Henry Evertson Cobb, D.D., pastor, 370 West End Avenue.

Church of the Strangers—Rev. Dr. Paul Mansfield Spencer, Fifty-seventh Street and Eighth Avenue.

Rev. William T. Jones, Point Pleasant, N. J.

Metropolitan Temple—Rev. Dr. John Wesley Hill, Seventh Avenue and Fourteenth Street.

Rev. T. A. Snively—208 South Thirteenth Street, Philadelphia.

Class 26, First Presbyterian Church Sunday School—Mr. C. E. Green, Morristown, N. J.

Some of these churches opened doors of missions and settlements for the accommodation of the wanderers, while others supplied funds sufficient to house considerable numbers in the cheap lodging-houses, and still others furnished them with clothing. Funds were also provided for supplying food for the unfortunates. It was a Christ-like work. These pastors and their people were literally carrying out the principles of the Master, who said, "I was an hungered, and ye fed me; naked, and ye clothed me; a stranger and ye took me in." We should like to see this example followed by churches everywhere, when the occasion serves.

The Man With One Talent

BY EUGENE THWING

BETTER one diamond than a thousand shining particles of diamond dust. The world has a welcome and a place for the man and the woman of the single talent, while the one with many accomplishments often fits nowhere particularly, seldom makes any very deep impression upon the age in which he or she lives, contributes little to the advancement of civilization, and drops out at last to be forgotten quickly by the hurrying throng.

The tendency of school and college life to-day seems to be toward giving young men and young women a little of everything and not much of anything. Often it is considered a disgrace to omit some of the branches of study ordinarily taken, and to spend more time on others. The vanity over an "all around" education which begins in school continues in after life and spoils many a good business or professional career.

The same distraction or division of aim and effort which causes the young man or young woman to fritter away the best years of preparation, and to falter on the threshold of life, causes the business man to lay out his plans on too vast a scale, and the man or woman of brilliant ability to attempt too many things at one time. They swell with a sense of their breadth, and reach, and versatility. They can do almost anything, and as a result they cannot make up their minds exactly what they want most to do, or what special place they intend to fill, and so they do nothing. Like the cow that stood midway between two stacks of hay unable to decide which to choose because both looked so good, and so starved to death, these men of too many talents fail to grow great on any one of them.

THE one talent man has been regarded as less favored than the ten talent man. In the Bible parable he so regarded himself, and laid away his talent in a napkin. Waste no pity on yourself, or any man, if there be only one talent entrusted. That one talent may be, and should be the direct means of enriching and glorifying life for yourself and for all those whose lives touch yours.

One talent is enough to keep the longest life busy every moment. It can never be developed or perfected to a point where there is nothing beyond. To get the most good and to do the most good with this one talent calls for the concentration of every energy and the consecration of soul and body.

Much that is good and attractive must be sacrificed, many prizes must remain unsought if we are to gain the one highest excellence of which we are capable, and win the one prize of our own particular high calling.

Versatility is the twin sister of mediocrity. A wide variety of accomplishments may help to pass the time away pleasantly, but in most cases will effectually prevent the accomplishment of any one great work. We want fewer human kaleidoscopes scattering their dazzling talents over many pretty fragments, making a gorgeous display for an instant, then another, and another, all different, all transient, all purposeless. We want more human burning-glasses, gathering all the rays of their ambition, their enthusiasm, their time and energies upon the focal point of their lives—the one thing most worth while which they have chosen. Then with Paul they can say: "This one thing I do." All new and distracting interests that tempt them into by-paths and threaten to dissipate their energies, weaken their resolve, or dim their vision can be met with the test question: "What is that to me? Will it help or hinder the thing to which my life is dedicated?"

CONCENTRATION does not mean narrowness. It does not mean separation from the world, nor self-absorption. The most intense application to one purpose in life may require many auxiliary activities, but they must be truly auxiliary, all working together to produce the one ultimate result. Paul had but one purpose, yet he declared: "I am made all things to all men that I might by all means save some." The man who would reach the goal of his ambition, the "mark of his high calling," may need to take, at times, paths that seem to lead him off from the main highway; he may find, even, that interruptions and delays are to be part of his real progress. In Henry Van Dyke's beautiful story, The Other Wise Man, Artaban started, full of earnest purpose, to find the King by the quickest route. Never for a moment was his devotion to the quest or the intense concentration of his efforts lost, but the way was not as he had planned. Many and various were the things that delayed and seemed to divert him, but all were essentially related to the one aim of his life, and all contributed to the final glorious success.

BEGIN with a right choice of goal. Concentration upon a wrong purpose is a blasting, withering curse to any life. "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve." There are many gods set up in the countinghouses, the factories, the halls of legislation, the editorial sanctums, the homes, and the fields of sport. Select your object and concentrate your forces upon it. Baal's prophets had concentration a-plenty when they "cried aloud and cut themselves with knives and lancets till the blood gushed out upon them," calling upon the name of Baal "from morning until noon." Their only trouble was that they had chosen the wrong god. Men and women are doing very much the same thing now, and, beginning with a wrong choice, their frenzied concentration in business, or politics, or pleasure is both self-destructive and hurtful to others.

Be sure that the choice of purpose and work represents the best that is in you and stands for your highest ideals. Be sure that it is not your choice alone, but that it is in obedience to the commission given you by your King. Then, with all of life's forces concentrated, with all life's enthusiasm burning warm and steady, with the soul ever rising upward with exalted effort, go onward toward the crown of the victor and the sweet music of the words, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

THE HUMBLE TOILER

TO WORK while yet the dawn is red
The humble toiler fares elate;
And daily earns his meed of bread,
And vexes not o'er questions great.

He knows no hidden Asteroid,
Or if the Sun is burning out;
To him the far is not the Void,
And God he has not learned to doubt.

But he finds joy in simple things,
And knows the peace of sweet, fair fields;
He drinks of sparkling, crystal springs,
And sees the beauty Nature yields.

He cares not if we sail the air,
Or bridge the Ocean vast and wide;
But he sees that the world is fair,
And Love is toiling by his side.

Our Lyric Choir he does not know;
For him old Homer sang in vain;
But he can feel the soft winds blow,
And hear the silver plash of rain.

And he can know a child's sweet love,
And find at home enjoyment sweet;
He sees the heavens smile above,
And hears the lark the morning greet.

A toiler with his spade and plow—
Yet happy as the rich can be;
He lives in the unfailing Now,
A soul content and glad and free!

GEORGE L. ANDREWS.

The Letter

OUR present cover is a reproduction from one of the most delightful of Meyer von Bremen's "story-telling pictures." In a cottage court two German peasant women have left their washing to overlook a missive which has just been received from the hand of a boy messenger who stands near by, waiting with a bouquet of flowers in his hand. The story is easily read; the pleasure in the face of the younger woman, the motherly eagerness and apprehension in the attitude of the elder, reveal one of life's familiar episodes simply and touchingly portrayed.

Meyer von Bremen, as a colorist and picture story teller, was little short of a genius. His motto, painted upon his studio wall, was this: "Make the best use of your time; it never returns." Indomitable perseverance, more than talent, brought him up among the masters, so that when he was still a young man he was frequently referred to as the later Rembrandt. At the age of thirty-five religion became a passion with him and his dream to be a great artist vanished in the desire to tell the heathen of the joys and beauties of Christianity. His art studies were given up, and his whole soul surrendered to a passion for the trials and adventures of a missionary's life in some distant land. A turning point came, however, and once again art became his absorbing passion. His purity and loftiness of character is expressed in his works and confirmed by the fact that his artistic life was one long ovation from his countless friends and admirers throughout Europe and America. Meyer von Bremen died in Berlin in 1886. "The Letter" was bought by Miss Catherine Lorillard Wolfe and brought to America in 1887.

THE campaign of the "Men and Religion Forward Movement" is approaching its culmination. It is expected that four thousand delegates will attend the "Conservation Congress," to be held in New York April 19 to 24. The conquests of the campaign will there be summed up and definite instruction given the laymen to guide and inspire them in their routine work in the home churches and the home towns.

Preceding this congress the New York campaign will be conducted from April 14 to 19. About the beginning of February vigorous plans for the metropolitan work were inaugurated. Dr. N. M. Pratt, formerly Dr. Jefferson's assistant at the Broadway Tabernacle and for five years pastor of the Pilgrim Congregational Church of Cleveland, has been placed in charge of the campaign, with headquarters at the Fifth Avenue Building. President John H. Finley, of the College of the City of New York, is chairman of the Committee of One Hundred, directing the movement in New York. The vice chairmen are Mr. William J. Schieffelin, a young business man who is always at the front in worthy enterprises; Mr. Mornay Williams, a consecrated lawyer; Congressman William S. Bennet, who is on the right side of all moral and spiritual questions; and Mr. William Fellows Morgan, business man and president of the New York Young Men's Christian Association. The Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, Bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of New York, is chairman of one of the important committees. Judge W. H. Olmstead is chairman of the Committee on Boys' Work; William H. Van Steenburgh, of the Committee for Looking after the Work in Auxiliary Cities; Mr. Henry M. Orne, of the Community Extension Campaign; John B. Clark, of the Committee of Social Service; Rev. Raymond C. Knox, of the Committee on Bible Study. Dr. Arthur J. Smith, who is chairman of the Permanent Evangelistic Committee of New York City, is chairman of the Committee on Evangelism in the present movement; Dr. John G. Fagg, chairman of the Committee on Missions; Mr. James M. Spears heads the Committee on Finance.

The city has been divided into twelve districts, eight in the Borough of Manhattan, and four in the Bronx. Each church in each district was asked to appoint a committee of five men, each of whom shall consider the interests of one of the five phases of the work of the movement, namely: Boys' Work, Bible Study, Evangelism, Missions and Social Service. A series of luncheons was held, and the pastors from three or four districts, together with one layman from each church, were invited to appoint place and time of the meetings for the complete organizations of their respective districts. Final district organizations were made during the week beginning February 26. On March 17, a mass meeting will be held at the Broadway Tabernacle, at which Fred B. Smith, chairman of the Nation-wide Movement, will address the metropolitan workers.

On April 2 the permanent Evangelistic Committee of New York will open its campaign for the season of 1912 by a mass meeting in Carnegie Hall. The workers of the present campaign of the Men and Religion Forward Movement will unite in that meeting, which is to be addressed by Gipsy Smith, who comes East from a tremendous evangelistic victory on the Pacific Coast and in the South. This will doubtless be one of the most vigorous and fruitful religious gatherings New York has seen in many years. The steady strength of the permanent committee, meeting the new enthusiasm of the temporary movement, and all under the inspiration of the consecrated and inspired evangelist, should mark an epoch in the religious life of the city. On April 14 Raymond Robins will address a mass meeting of the workers in the Borough of Manhattan at the Hippodrome, and the Rev. Charles Stelzle will hold a corresponding meeting for the workers in the Bronx. April 15 to 19 will be the special campaign days.

While these plans have been in the process of completion for the work in New York, other cities in the East have been reached by the great campaign. Newark, N. J., with its neighboring towns was the scene of an active campaign which was vigorous and successful. The attendance at the institutes averaged from 725 to 750. Boys' institutes were also well attended. On the evening of the closing Sunday the largest theater in Newark was crowded. Two hundred men signed cards at this meeting expressing a decision to lead a Christian life. Ministers of the city have been led to a closer union and are trying to perfect a ministers' organization. The campaign in Boston was full of enthusiasm. Mr. Fred B. Smith and the Rev. Charles Stelzle addressed two thousand men on January 21. Convention meetings were largely attended as were also the noon evangelistic meetings. A large number of men and boys took a forward step on the last Sunday of the campaign, many making the first decision to live Christian lives, and others pledging themselves to more active Christian service. Successful meetings were held also in Portland, Me., Washington and Baltimore.

One of the results of the campaign in Baltimore was the determination to organize a "Flying Squadron," consisting of automobile loads of ministers and laymen, who will invade the suburbs and "carry the message of the Forward Movement to every county, town, village, and cross-roads settlement in the State of Maryland."

The "surveys" made in various cities have given local churches plain views of the tasks awaiting them, and a frank estimate as to whether they are meeting the tasks adequately. While great emphasis has been laid on "social service" the leaders of the movement declare that spiritual matters are being insistently emphasized. It is possible that readers of the news of the campaign have been misled in this respect by the absence of reports of great ingathering of converts. The fact is that the chief point of the movement has been to train the men of the churches in methods of Christian work, rather than to make direct appeal to those outside. Since this is the case, a true estimate of its results can only be made after the men who have been thus trained and inspired have had adequate time to work out the plans outlined.

If the men of other cities will follow the example, for instance, of the men of Mishawaka, Ind., the harvest will be rich indeed. Rev. A. C. Ormond, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of that city, writes:

"I have never seen anything like the Men and Religion Movement to stir up the laymen to active work for Christ. We had our campaign in October; almost two months have passed since the close, but the activity of the men, instead of abating, has increased. The men have gotten down to solid business and are making things go for God and righteousness."

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—ON FEBRUARY 19 President Taft sent to the Senate for confirmation as associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, vice the late Justice Harlan, the name of Chancellor Mahlon Pitney of the State of New Jersey. Chancellor Pitney is regarded as an expert jurist. He has long been a leader in New Jersey legal affairs and has served as Congressman and State Senator.

—ON FEBRUARY 1 General Manuel Bonilla assumed the presidency of Honduras. General Manuel Bonilla was elected on November 3, 1911. His election followed a successful revolution, attended by much fighting against the government of President Davila, who was deposed. Peace was brought about between the revolutionaries and the government forces at a conference at which Thomas C. Dawson represented the United States and was successful in bringing the parties together.

A COMPROMISE BETWEEN the striking mill hands of Lawrence, Mass., and the agents of mills not immediately controlled by the American Woolen Company has been reached. All the demands of the strikers except the 15 per cent. increase of wages were conceded. The strikers got their demand for a fifty-six hour schedule for fifty-four hours' work, with an increase of pay of 5 per cent. instead of 15 per cent. As an evidence of the sincerity of the arrangement it was said that the employees of the Lower Pacific Mills, of whom about 80 per cent. are back at work, are being paid on the new terms. Such a conclusion on the part of the employers of about two-thirds of the striking operatives is considered a virtual victory for the strikers.

—FRIENDLY RELATIONS have been re-established between Paraguay and the Argentine Republic. Senor Bosch, Argentine Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Federico Caoas, Paraguayan Minister of Justice, on February 18 signed a protocol for the settlement of the trouble between the two republics. Paraguay, it is announced, has given satisfaction to Argentina for attacks upon Argentine shipping and property. It is expected that the diplomatic representatives of the two countries will return to their posts immediately.

—MAYOR SHANK, OF INDIANAPOLIS, has invaded New York, bearing some clear-cut ideas and delivering some clear-cut utterances. He met the reporters and the market men of the city and told them some things which it was good for them and for the public to know. Among other things he declared that in Albany an apple man told him that he had on hand many carloads of fruit that he would be glad to sell at $2.75 a barrel, but he declared that "the commission men would not let him move a peck for fear it would break the price from the $8 and $9 apples were bringing." This dealer added, "If every man, woman and child in New York City ate an apple every day until apples came in again I'd have enough to supply them, but they'll rot on my hands; they won't let me move them." The mayor declares that by his personally conducted market in Indianapolis he brought the price of potatoes down from $1.50 to 80 cents a bushel; turkeys from 25 cents a pound to 17 cents; chicken from 22 cents to 15 cents; apples from 70 cents a peck to 25 cents.

A FRAGRANT TRIBUTE

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD seems to me like a beautiful garden filled with all the beautiful flowers: the crocuses, tulips, hyacinths, pansies, violets, lilies of the valley, forget-me-nots, roses, carnations, heliotropes, geraniums, chrysanthemums, and orchids. It would be impossible to make a choice.

What Shall We Do With Porto Rico?

BY CHARLES M. PEPPER

OUR Porto Rico neighbors are complaining of neglect. They feel, being a part of the great American family over which the Stars and Stripes float, that nevertheless they are not treated as full members of the family. They want to be citizens of the United States instead of merely citizens of Porto Rico.

When, after the war with Spain, Porto Rico was made part of American territory, it will be recalled that under the legislation of Congress and the Supreme Court decisions the people of the island were left in a somewhat uncertain position. They were given all the rights of protection due them as American citizens, but not full participation in all that American citizenship implies. This was a temporary condition due to our experimental position in regard to newly acquired territory. There were some problems which could not be settled offhand, and Porto Rican citizenship was one of them. It was believed, however, that after a while the political status of the people of Porto Rico who had ceased to be Spanish subjects would be settled satisfactorily to them.

Recommendations have been made in Presidential messages for granting full citizenship and for determining the exact position of the Porto Ricans. Committees of Congress have reported favorably on these recommendations and have prepared bills to settle all the doubtful questions. But in the press of other Congressional business these measures have not been enacted into laws. That is why the Porto Ricans feel that they are neglected. It is not an intentional neglect on the part of the American people nor probably on the part of Congress, for Congress has had subjects of very great importance before it, which took the right of way over Porto Rico and other questions. It is hoped, however, that before the present session ends the matter of Porto Rican citizenship will be settled. In the meantime the island has a spokesman for its wishes in a commissioner, who sits in Congress, although he has no right to vote as have the members from the States of the Union. This commissioner from Porto Rico has exactly the same standing as the commissioners from Hawaii and the Philippine Islands.

While the people of Porto Rico may feel that they have been neglected in this matter of citizenship and political status, there has certainly been no neglect in the American administration of the island. After the Spanish war was ended a good many old Spanish traditions of misrule disappeared. The American promise was for schools and roads and impartial administration of justice. All these things and even more Porto Rico has had for the last ten years. The sugar industry especially has reached a high state of development. While the hurricane which some years ago destroyed the coffee plantations was a serious blow, the effects of that loss and suffering have long since disappeared. I think every one who knows the conditions will agree that Porto Rico is a pretty prosperous little island, and its million inhabitants have every reason to be contented with their means of living.

A million inhabitants for an island of this size makes a pretty dense population, especially when it is considered that the population is essentially an agricultural one. There are no big manufacturing towns, such as in Belgium or Rhode Island for instance. San Juan on the northern coast and Ponce on the southern coast are the main commercial centers. It is pleasanter to travel across the island by the magnificent military road than to take a vessel around the coast. San Juan always seemed to me one of the most picturesque little cities in the Antilles. It was founded just four hundred years ago by Ponce de Leon. He might have found the secret of perpetual youth there, if it could be found anywhere in the world, because the climate is a delightful one for the tropics. The breezes of the Atlantic are refreshing and invigorating. San Juan is one of the few ports in the West Indies which have been free from yellow fever epidemics in past years, before medical science, by the discovery of the mosquito bite as the propagating agent, had found effective means of combating this disease.

There are two things about San Juan which are to be found in almost every part of Spanish America where there are mountains or highlands. One is the statue of Columbus. The other is the Castle of El Morro. Most people of the United States are more familiar with Morro Castle in Havana. When they hear there is another Morro at Santiago in Cuba and then another in Porto Rico they wonder what it means. The explanation is quite simple. These castles or citadels are located on projecting necks of high land which dominate the harbor entrances. El Morro in Spanish simply means "the snout." Some of the picturesqueness of the term seems to disappear when we speak of a snout of land, but it is very good geographical terminology. Rural life in Porto Rico is most delightful. Even since the American occupation many of the primitive customs prevail. There is the most kindly and unaffected hospitality. When we first took control of the island our soldiers and some of our civilian officials thought that the inhabitants were lazy. The Northerner always speaks of the dweller in the tropics as lazy, yet the land is cultivated and work is done in spite of a burning sun. The truth about the so-called lazy inhabitants of Porto Rico was later learned by means of medical discoveries. It was found that very many were actual sufferers from a parasite which got into the blood and caused an anæmic condition. This was the hookworm. When the American medical officers began to eradicate the hookworm there was greater disposition shown to work. The process of eradication is going on now just as in our Southern States, where this parasite also exists.

Seeking After Strange Gods

WHILE the "Men and Religion" movement is nearing its meridian, and churches are active in their work at home and pressing a vigorous Gospel campaign in distant countries, it is astonishing to find so much indifference to the subtle and dangerous heathen invasion which is in progress in our own land. Within a few years, the vanguard of Oriental heathenism has spied out and occupied unhindered much vantage ground from which they may extend their conquests. Bahaism, Mohammedanism, Vedantism, Buddhism and other ancient systems are already represented here by centers of worship for their "strange gods." Los Angeles has a temple to Krishna, Chicago a house of worship dedicated to Mazdaznan, Seattle another to Buddha, and San Francisco, in addition to its Chinese "joss-houses," has now a Hindu temple. There are schools of Oriental religion in the woods and on the mountain slopes, and, like Israel in her idolatrous days, we are building temples not to Baal and Ashtaroth, but to a chain of heathen deities most of whose names, till now, have been held in abhorrence by the Christian nations of the world. In these places, strange and mysterious rites are conducted by swamis and other teachers and it is a significant fact that almost all the devotees are American women.

That there is something radically wrong in this semi-secret occult propaganda is made evident by a recent article in the New York Herald, which gives the names of a number of prominent women who have fallen under the spell of this heathen teaching. One woman has given her entire fortune to the work and is now in a retreat for the insane; another is in an Illinois lunatic asylum; a third in Massachusetts has been restrained by law from giving away all her property; a fourth, in Indiana, has been made dangerously ill by her studies in Oriental mysticism, while a fifth, in Lafayette, Ind., has left home, husband and children, joining the "sun worshipers" to seek what is known in the jargon of the cult as the "perfect life." One Hindu leader has boasted that he has made more than 5,000 converts in this country, nearly all women. Love is the dominant key of the doctrine taught by these Oriental mystics to their followers and their system is represented as sensuous in the last degree—"words piled on words, mystic and unfathomable," so that the brain grows confused in trying to find out the hidden meaning. It is true that here all religions stand equal before the law and are guaranteed equal privileges; but there seems to be something more than a reasonable doubt whether teachings which produce such disastrous results are entitled to be considered as religious or diabolic. They are robbing American women of their means, their position, their homes, their families and their reason, and the heathen conquest still goes on. It would be well for our churches, which are doing so much excellent work among the heathen abroad, to look this nearer situation straight in the face and to do what lies in their power to open the eyes of our people to the true character of these delusive and dangerous doctrines that are wrecking lives and destroying souls, without a word of protest being raised against them.

The Main Issue

AGAIN and again denominations, churches and individuals slip back into the error of trying to buy salvation. Paul's quarrel with the Jews was not that they were not trying to be good, but that they were trying too hard. "I bear them record that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge; for they, being ignorant of God's righteousness and going about to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God." The early Christians, learning the way of salvation by faith, sought to find keeping and perfecting grace by works, and Paul exclaims to one of their churches: "O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you?" Again the church slipped back to a trust in deeds, and Luther was inspired by the Holy Spirit to rescue it. Two centuries later the Protestant Church in England had gone back to form rather than fire, and John Wesley stirred the United Kingdom by preaching salvation through simple faith

"What shall we do," asked the Jews, "that we might work the works of God?" "This is the work of God," Jesus answered, "that ye believe." From our sin, from our restlessness, from our fear, from our inefficiency, we are saved by faith, faith in the crucified and risen Saviour. Salvation is love, and love comes by faith. The man who thinks he can save himself is by that very self-willed and self-confident attitude of mind shutting out the light and the fragrance of the divine blessing.

There is plenty of work to be done! Yes, truly. But it is done best and quickest and most efficiently when the soul is completely trusting God for all its needs. When a man is thus trusting God most submissively and most completely for spiritual safety, spiritual strength and spiritual blessing, he will be most strenuously and most constantly "about his Father's business." Those who trust most, love most; those who love most, serve most.

We cannot purchase our salvation by toil and toil; it has been purchased for us. We cannot do the tasks of the spiritual commonwealth in our own strength; those tasks demand the power of God. The true motive and the real power come to the soul that constantly has faith in Him. So the main issue is, at every step, "Am I trusting God completely now?"

The Surprises of China

CHINA is still proving itself a land of surprises. The revolution came as a surprise to the outside world; at least, its suddenness was unexpected. The formation of the republic was a piece of amazing promptness. The elevation to the presidency of a progressive young man of Western training and a convert to the Christian faith was spectacular and interesting. The steadiness of the hand of Yuan Shi Kai in the negotiations leading to the abdication of the throne and the surrender of the Manchus has been admirable and noteworthy. The next surprise was the resignation of Dr. Sun from the presidency in favor of this older statesman, Yuan Shi Kai. There was real regret over this decision of Dr. Sun, though his unselfish patriotism met with high praise. There seemed to be no reasonable doubt that he could hold the Southern States together in a republic, but his ability to hold the North was problematical. Yuan Shi Kai's influence and authority are prodigious, and he could undoubtedly hold both the North and the South to the republican government.

Dr. Sun will go down to history as the brave, vigorous, self-sacrificing man who guided the troubled country through the rapids of revolution to the quiet waters of a better and freer national life, and then yielded the helm to another man.

But while praises like this were being sounded for the younger man, the crowning surprise came when the stalwart Yuan declined the honor of heading the new nation. This leaves Dr. Sun a clear field for receiving the popular vote, which will likely be overwhelmingly in favor of his presidency.

It is said that the influence of the Christian missionaries and the Christian schools have been largely responsible for the creation of the new order of things in China. Christianity will make rapid strides in the new republic. The convention just signed at the Hague International Opium Conference will help rid the land of the curse of the opium habit. It is to be hoped that the Christian nations of the world, scorning the aggressive and oppressive spirit of earlier days, will welcome the new China into the circles of civilization and help it to attain and to keep the freedom and light toward which it has so manfully struggled.

Our Bible Question Class

THERE is probably no department of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that gives greater promise of absorbing interest and spiritual helpfulness to our readers than the Bible Question Class, which is now a regular monthly feature of the paper. These questions, which take a wide range, are especially designed to stimulate Bible reading. They differ from the ordinary Bible Courses which usually appeal only to a limited number and demand systematic study, whereas our twelve questions, which appear monthly, can be discussed by the whole Family Circle, or studied by an individual, and afford a delightful and profitable occupation for leisure hours. We invite all who love God's Word to join the Bible Question Class. You may not be able at the outset to answer all the questions, although they are not by any means purposely made difficult; but make the effort and answer what you can. If you sit down with your reference Bible, especially if it contains a Concordance, you will soon be pleasantly surprised at the progress you will make. Familiarity with the Bible should be the aim of every Christian, old and young, and we know of no better or more agreeable way than this Class affords. In the course of a single season, by giving up a few hours each month to this work, you will be astonished at your growth in Bible knowledge, and you will have a clearer comprehension of many passages in the old Book. "Search the Scriptures" yourself, and invite your friends to join you in the helpful and inspiring task. If every reader who is personally interested in this popular department of Bible Study would bring one more, we might soon have the largest Bible Question Class in the world! The sole qualification is that every member must be a regular reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Unknown Guests

POPULAR sympathy with the work of the Bowery Mission's Bread Line among the homeless unemployed men of the metropolis is showing itself this winter in many different ways. It is not surprising that this should be so. When one realizes that there are some 50,000 able-bodied unemployed in the city at this season—a very large proportion of them destitute and down-and-out — the appeal of such a situation touches even the most indifferent. Everybody knows that the trifling cost of a meal to a few of these poor fellows, though insignificant, is yet so great an encouragement to the sufferers that few can hesitate when the appeal is made to them. A few evenings ago, a wealthy man entered the Bowery Mission while a meeting was in progress. He gazed with interest on the hundreds of honest, earnest faces. He saw young men, old, gray-haired men and a sprinkling of growing lads. He noted their thin garments, ill fitted to keep out the chilling winds of winter, and their pinched, hunger-stricken faces. Invited to speak, he gave a cheering message; but like many others, he soon realized that it was a situation where actions would speak louder than words. On leaving the platform he asked about the cost of the Bread Line meal and, learning that it was something less than two and a half cents, he provided for 500 meals at next morning's Bread Line. These 500 men and boys were his guests; and, depend upon it, their gratitude to their unknown host was more sincere than that of many of the guests he had entertained in his fashionable home. Many a prayer goes up from the Bread Line that will return in blessing to those who have made this beautiful charity a possibility.

"Maine" Monument Cornerstone Laid

ON FEBRUARY 15, at the entrance to the Central Park at Eighth Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street in New York City, was laid the cornerstone of a splendid monument which is to commemorate the destruction of the 266 precious lives in the blowing up of the Maine in Havana harbor fourteen years ago. The shaft is also to be a monument to all the sailors who died in the Spanish-American War. The exercises were presided over by General James Grant Wilson. A copper box had been prepared, containing the following articles: copy of Rear-Admiral Charles D. Sigsbee's personal narrative of the Maine disaster; message from the President of the United States transmitting the report of the Naval Court of Inquiry upon the destruction of the Maine, together with testimony taken before the court; annual report of the Chief of Engineers, 1911, with an appendix on the removal of the wreck of the Maine; one envelope deposited by the contractors; six United States coins—one of each denomination; program of the exercises in connection with the laying of the cornerstone; history of the Maine Monument; copy of an address by General Wilson upon Commodore Isaac Hull and the frigate Constitution, delivered before the New York Society of the Order of Founders and Patriots of America, October 23, 1910; sheet containing the signatures of the committee, the sculptor and architect, and New York daily newspapers of February 14, 1912. As the cornerstone was lowered into place over the box and the tackle removed, Rear-Admiral Leutze said, slowly: "I now declare that the cornerstone of the Maine National Monument is laid." The address of the day by Major-General Daniel E. Sickles, the sole surviving corps commander of the Army of the Potomac, followed. He began by saying: "The Maine disaster was one of far-reaching effects. The blowing up of the Maine by Spanish hands and by Spanish orders sounded the death knell of Spanish rule on American soil—a rule which should have been ended long before. It was a declaration of war upon the United States which this country was not slow to heed." Among those present at the exercises were H. Van Buren Magonigle, the architect, and Attillo Piccirrill, the sculptor of the monument, and Morris Simons, the National Commander of the Spanish War Veterans. The monument, which is to cost $175,000 and be one of the finest on Manhattan Island, is expected to be ready for dedication by October 1. In the raising of the Maine fortunately, and contrary to expectation, the bones of the brave men were found, and they are to be brought home for burial. These men, and those like them who have died for their country, do not need any monuments. Their love, their valor, their sacrifice are a monument broader and higher and more enduring than any one built of stone, or brass, or marble. Theirs is a monument unstained by the finger of time, unspoiled by the chemistry of years. But we, the living, need these material monuments to remind us of the debt of gratitude we owe the patriots and heroes of the past, and to inspire us with greater patriotism and a stronger determination to devote ourselves to the maintenance of the free institutions they have preserved to us by a price so costly. The building of monuments began early among the Jews. Joshua built one at Gilgal of stones taken out of the Jordan, and at its dedication said:

When your children shall ask their fathers in time to come, saying, What mean these stones? then ye shall let your children know, saying, Israel came over this Jordan on dry land. (Josh. 4: 21, 22.)

Dog Rescues Eight Persons

CAPTAIN GUSTAV GUSTAVSON started with the launch Morrisania, with eight on board, from South Brother Island in Long Island Sound. The boat was caught in an ice floe with a terrible tide, and was in imminent peril. The captain rang his bell, sounded his whistle, while one of the passengers used a megaphone to call for help. Police Lieutenant Frederick Mott and three men with the patrol boat heard the cry of alarm, and hastened to the rescue. They found themselves also in great peril, but pushed on. They were unable to reach the Morrisania. But they got so close that the captain put a rope in the mouth of his black Scotch collie Nero, and bade him swim over the water space that separated them, which he did, and with it the launch, almost wrecked, was fastened to the patrol boat, which with great difficulty towed it to safety. Collies, for generations, have been bred to do the work of shepherds, and in intellect and heart they seem almost human. Even in ancient days the faithful qualities of the dogs of the household were not unconsidered.

Yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table. (Matt. 15:27.)

Aids Italy's Silk Crop

THE United States Bureau of Entomology has been doing a great favor to Italy in sending help to destroy the enemy of the silk crop. It shipped to that country a parasite that destroys the scale on the mulberry trees that has threatened the silk industry there. Professor Antonio Brese, noticing that the mulberry leaves were speedily vanishing and with them the hope of silk production, applied to Washington for help, and Dr. Howard, of the department, sent him a parasite new to science. Now the news comes from Italy that this murderer of the murderer of the silkworm is doing its work, and that the mulberry leaves are beginning to show their old form. It is to be hoped that the scientific authorities who are trying so hard to find a parasite that will destroy the boll weevil, the alfalfa weevil, and the gipsy moth in this country will be entirely successful. No one knows the danger and the destruction of these enemies of the crops better than the American farmer. Special mention is made in the Bible of grasshoppers and locusts as destroyers of crops. They had silk and mulberry trees in their times. Everything that has life has some enemy. The herds and flocks and creatures are on the lookout for danger, and fight against and fly from the enemy. Every plant has some enemy, some worm to bore into the ground and cut the root, or some insect to eat the leaves and kill it. Not only are the orchards attacked, but great forest trees like the elm and chestnut are destroyed by the tiny marauders. Science will discover a remedy for these ravages. A memorable event is mentioned as the result of God's voice in a grove of mulberry trees:

Therefore David inquired again of God; and God said unto him, Go not up after them; turn away from them, and come upon them over against the mulberry trees. (I. Chron. 14: 14.)

Rat Causes Great Trouble

AT ITHACA, N. Y., the other Sunday night the electric lights in the streets and private houses suddenly went out, and all of the trolley cars of the city stood dead on the tracks. The trouble continued till late Monday, when it was discovered that a rat at the power station had gnawed the insulation from one of the main wires, causing a short circuit of the entire lighting and trolley system. The 2,200 volts of electricity did not leave anything of the rat, but its little teeth had done a tremendous amount of damage. The little things can do great harm. The little words of anger or slander, the little deeds of jealousy or hate or selfishness, even one word or act of sin, often gnaws the insulation and cuts off the light and power from a community. The rat did not know any better than to be nosing about the live wires and was not to blame; but people know better and should be more careful about gnawing away the insulation and bringing their neighbors into moral darkness and distress and incinerating themselves. The apostle refers to the great damage done by little things in another figure:

Even so the tongue is a little member, and boasteth great things. Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth! (James 3: 5.)

Makes Children Happy

IN ONE of the suburbs of Brooklyn there is a single hill in the neighborhood which the children used for coasting after a heavy snowstorm. A man living near by objected to the crowds and noise of the children at their sport, and failing to stop it, he invoked the aid of the police to put an end to the annoyance. An old blacksmith, over seventy, noticed that the hill was deserted, and learning the reason went to the police headquarters to have the guard removed. Failing in this he sought the owner of the hill and leased it for sixty days, and paid the price in advance, and then he told the boys and girls they should slide down the hill to their hearts' content, and that if the snow lasted more than two months he would rent it for another term. The children were wild with delight and cheered and cheered him, and begged him to ride down the hill on their sleds, which he did. The old blacksmith, in his love for the children and in his plans for their happiness, reminds us of the spirit and words of the Master:

Whosoever shall receive one of such children in my name receiveth me. (Mark 9: 37.)

Messengers Robbed of $25,000

ONE of the most daring and remarkable robberies known in years was accomplished the other day in the financial district of New York by five automobile bandits, who held up a taxicab and robbed two bank messengers of three thousand five-dollar bills and one thousand ten-dollar bills which they had in a telescope bag, and which they were taking to the East River National Bank. Pistols were held against the chauffeur and messengers, who were unarmed, and the bandits drove swiftly and in silence to a certain corner, where the men got out, and putting the money in a large black automobile hastened away. As yet they have not been discovered. This is another one of the numerous taxicab robberies of New York City. There is an epidemic of murder as well as robbery in New York. It is a shame and scandal that it is so. Whoever is responsible for this riot of crime should be called to a strict account. The prophet of old saw such scenes of highway robbery and murder.

And as troops of robbers wait for a man, so the company of priests murder in the way by consent. (Hos. 6: 9.)

A CATHEDRAL OF THE DESERT

ONLY a little more than twenty-five years ago the world bared its head in honor of the gallant and devoted General Gordon and the name Khartoum came into our language as a word of squalor, of barbarism, of horror and of heroism. Fourteen years ago General Kitchener led his columns up through the desert to Khartoum; through thirst and fanatic enemies to a city of mud huts between the White and the Blue Niles. To-day he is happy to be "Kitchener of Khartoum," for, from a city of savagery and squalor there has risen a complete new town. The military railway now takes one from Wadi Halfa to Khartoum in two days. Wide, white streets are now traversed by a tram line; Gordon College has risen from the sands to commemorate "the death in the desert"; a spacious government house and fine administration buildings have become the center of a section of beautiful residences, and a few weeks ago as the climax of this redemption from its past, Khartoum dedicated a splendid new cathedral.

The consecration service took place at 8.45 A.M. and was attended by about six hundred people, many of whom were officers or officials whose brilliant uniforms and dresses splashed the cool, dim interior with gorgeous color. Outside the cathedral grounds thronged a mass of the native population, dimly conscious that all this was in memory of him whom they call "Ordoon," and perhaps feeling that it was an impressive exhibition of that faith to which Gordon, whose statue stands close to the cathedral, bore consistent witness. Among the guests were the Greek Archbishop of Abyssinia and Sudan, the Greek Archbishop of Axium, and the Coptic Patriarch from Alexandria, the Coptic Archbishop of Jerusalem, and the Coptic Bishop, the Grand Kadi, and the Grand Mufti of the Moslem community.

The Sirdar, Sir Reginald Wingate, and Lady Wingate Leaving the Cathedral After the Ceremony

The procession was formed in a shaded place outside, while Sir Reginald Wingate was conducted to his seat in the chancel. After it had entered the cathedral, the Sirdar, as chairman of the committee, read the petition of consecration, which was assented to by the Bishop of London. When the legal deed of conveyance had been presented the service proceeded in the regular way. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of London, who took as his text John 15: 13, and spoke largely with Gordon as his example.

Among the parts consecrated was the Gordon chapel. In it is placed the appropriate inscription: "Praise God for Charles George Gordon, a servant of Jesus Christ, whose labor was not in vain in the Lord."

A Congress of Sunday School Superintendents

AMONG the great problems of the day is the question of the need of more general systematic religious teaching for the young. President Taft has said: "No matter what views are taken of general education, we all agree—Protestant, Catholic, and Jew alike—that Sunday School education is absolutely necessary to secure moral uplift and religious spirit. Among the Methodists the latest phase of the growing interest in Sunday School work is the Sunday School Congress. The first was held in Columbus, O. The second recently occurred in New York City and was on a scale never before attempted by Methodists in the East. Twelve hundred Sunday School experts, some of them local leaders, others officials of general societies, considered ideas making for efficiency in the schools where multitudes of boys and girls are getting their foundation for moral and spiritual development.

Senator Travis

"Efficiency is the charmed word of the age," said Wade C. Barclay, of Chicago, educational secretary of the Board of Sunday Schools; "and nowhere is it so much needed as in Sunday School work. The Sunday School in order to do its work must provide efficient teachers. The teaching must be on a par with day school instruction. No longer will boys and girls be satisfied with irresponsible and untrained leaders. Lying at the root of every Sunday School problem is the question of well-trained teachers. Improve the teachers and we improve every part of our school. Architecture and equipment are secondary to the value of perfectly equipped teachers."

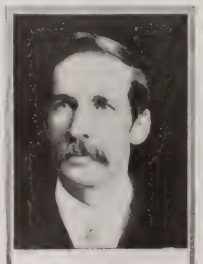
A demand for greater efficiency and for higher standards was the keynote of all sessions. The superintendent was urged to recognize the importance of carefully prepared and executed programs, of thorough organization of his school, of the value of correlating all departments so that from the kindergarten to the senior adult class and the home department and mission study class there should be a united spirit. Frank A. Horne, who has been called an "efficiency expert in Sunday School organization," said that "organization is for the purpose of intelligent production and efficient work," and compared the Sunday School to a factory whose output must depend upon the efficiency of the workers. However, he uttered the warning note, that "though the equipment be ever so fine, it will be good for nothing without power; we must not forget that we need above all other things more power from on high."

It was the opinion of Frank L. Brown of the famous Bushwick Avenue School, Brooklyn, the second largest Sunday School in the world, that "no Sunday School teacher should come to school with less than one hundred and twenty pounds of steam," and he believes in "giving teachers a big idea of their responsibility." As for superintendents, Mr. Brown describes the ideal as "a man of heart, a lover of children, a friend of everybody."

"If you are going to capture the children of today," said Bishop Luther B. Wilson, "if you are going to save the great population of your city, it means for you absolute sacrifice of self. If you are a member of any church, or if you are a disciple of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, your place is not on the grandstand watching the players on the field, your place is down among them." Insistence upon the use of the Bible by the individual scholar was reiterated by various speakers. "Make the Sunday School a Bible School," was the watchword.

How to hold the pupils of "the 'teen age" was a vital theme at the congress, and many startling statistics were given by Dr. Edgar Blake, of Chicago, assistant corresponding secretary, Board of Sunday Schools, who has devoted much time to investigation in this direction. According to this authority five hundred pupils of intermediate years disappeared from one school in twelve months; in another, the number of lads who left the Sunday School in ten years was larger than the entire church membership; the Wesleyan Church in England is losing eight per cent. of its Sunday School from the church, and the situation in this country is even graver. "I doubt if we hold one-quarter of our Sunday School in our church membership," said Dr. Blake, "and the greatest number of losses occurs among the pupils in the 'teens. Awakening to the knowledge of their own personality and freedom of choice and decision, frequently the first break, the first assertion of new-found freedom, is the break from religious associations. Next to the church, the most powerful single agency for the upbuilding of the child is the Sunday School. The two most potent influences for molding young men and women lose their hold at the same time. A large majority of homes are failures as to holding the children to religious traditions, therefore the other organizations must come to their help."

Wm. H. Ridgway



Frank L. Brown

Bishop Wilson

The Hon. Eugene M. Travis, State Senator, and superintendent of the Nostrand Avenue Sunday School, Brooklyn, spoke in behalf of really entertaining forms of amusement and entertainment as an adjunct in the winning of young people to a strong Sunday School allegiance. It was his opinion that the Sunday School should offer large opportunities for social life.

William H. Ridgway of Coatesville, Pa., made a characteristic address on "The Noblest Business on Earth," in which he said: "The greatest business in this world is religious business. The greatest business men of this land are Christian men. The very cream of the country's business men are giving hours of their time every day to plans for the salvation of young men. The American people are not a set of rascals. They are Christian men." M. K. H.

HOPES OF EARLY PEACE IN CHINA

NEWS from China this week is of a more encouraging character. The Republic having been publicly proclaimed, there are now hopes that the country will soon quiet down. It will undoubtedly take weeks, and possibly even months, before order is restored in some of the remote districts. Reports from Peking are conflicting regarding the presidency, some stating that Yuan Shi Kai will accept, others that he declines on account of age, and that he has advocated the election of Dr. Sun Yat Sen.

Famine Sufferers Sorting Leaves for Food

Dr. Sun, in an interview in Shanghai, spoke of the condition of the famine sufferers. Owing to the war, the government had been helpless to meet the emergency; but he hoped that in the near future, China would be able to take care of its own.

The Central China Famine Relief Committee in Shanghai is meanwhile making a strenuous effort to relieve the widespread distress in the Yangtse Valley. In spite of the war and the stagnation of business, the authorities of Canton, Hongkong, Swatow and Penang have given liberally towards famine relief. Conditions in the famine province are most distressing. In one village, Lintse, out of 700 persons, only 140 had bread to eat, the remainder living on gruel made almost exclusively of greens and weeds. In the Wuhu district, an effort is being made to build large dykes along the river to prevent future inundations, and the money paid for labor helps the famine sufferers. Famine relief works have been started in various places with good effect, yet only a small section of the affected districts can be helped by such means. At Pingtu, in Shantung province, some of the famine sufferers were found subsisting on leaves and dead dogs. In North Kiangsu and Anhui an excellent relief work is being done. The one hopeful feature in connection with the present famine is the evidence of a strong public sentiment in favor of such measures as will prevent a recurrence of similar suffering in the future, by public engineering works on a large scale, under government auspices.

In a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the Rev. E. C. Lobenstine, honorary secretary of the Central Famine Relief Committee, writes that there has been much suffering in and around Hankow, from which city there was a great exodus of the population at the beginning of the war. These refugees are now returning and need to be provided for temporarily with huts, clothing and food. Public works are being opened to give employment to the able-bodied and food will be distributed to those unable to work, including women and children. Many well-to-do families have lost everything, and some are now begging in the streets. Children have been separated from their parents, wives have lost their husbands and are left helpless with little ones to provide for. Besides, there are many who have been crippled or otherwise injured during the fighting, and these add to the general sum of misery.

A number of contributions for famine relief have been received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and these have been forwarded to Bishop Greer's Committee in New York, which is co-operating with the Central Committee in Shanghai.

Our appeal in behalf of the 700 famine orphan children, distributed at different missionary stations throughout China, is meeting with cordial responses from many readers. These children, as we already explained, were originally included in the 2,000 little orphan waifs for whom provision was made through the generosity of readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but who, owing to the death of patrons and other causes, are now left unsupported. The good missionaries are grateful at the prospect of support for the children, especially at a time when famine conditions prevail throughout the country, and when, without such provision, it would be impossible for the missionaries to keep their little charges. This is an opportunity for real service in a special field, for by helping the missionaries to provide for these 700 children, our readers are aiding the cause of humanity and of Christianity in China. Every contribution for the children should be addressed "Famine Orphan Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City."

Selling the Framework of the House

JERRY'S TENEMENTS

BY ANNE WARNER

JERRY'S uncle had left him the houses. When our relatives leave us things we do not always know just what to do with them, and at first Jerry did not know just what to do with the houses. He was young, very clever, smooth-shaven, pleasing to look at, and most up-to-date; the houses were old, very dirty and hideous to look at, and oh, so far behind the times! At first sight their new owner was for pulling them down at once, but the agent who was with him told him the extent of their rent-roll, and it caused the young man to open his eyes.

"Why, who ever will pay that?" he asked in great and utter surprise.

"Italians," responded the agent. "There's a big pressure for rooms in this quarter; they never stand vacant for more than a day or so."

Jerry said no more about pulling them down, but the idea that such black little holes "never stood vacant more than a day or so" exercised a strange fascination for his curiosity. It was not long before he felt irresistibly drawn to go and look at them again; and this time he walked twice round them, viewing the whole disagreeable tout ensemble by the light of the knowledge that people were wild to live there. He couldn't possibly imagine a place where he should less like to live; he found it all close to loathsome, and yet there were those who liked it!

None of the tenants who saw the good-looking young man picking his way among their ash-heaps and old cans had any suspicion of his relation to them. They did not trouble their heads as to who he was or what he wanted, but watched him idly until he went away, and then forgot all about him.

But Jerry could not forget them thus easily. They haunted him. Some of the children were so pretty—or would have been so pretty had they been clean. And the mothers looked so thin. It troubled him—rather. Even if they did choose to live in that way, it seemed a pity. It seemed to him that something must be wrong with any one who could choose to live that way. He pondered it quite a bit. After all he wasn't sure but that the best thing would be to pull them all down. But then—the agent said that so many people wanted just such houses. He felt still more bothered. Such a puzzle! In a few days he carried his burden to the agent.

"If I build better ones—" he suggested.

"They couldn't afford to live in them," said the agent promptly.

That was a facer. Jerry was not advanced philanthropist enough to see any way around such an argument. So he let his shocking tenements go on leaning against one another. Of course, if people wanted to live in them who wouldn't have any place to live if he pulled them down—? He didn't know what a wretched old argument for misery he was using.

And yet he couldn't forget them and be idly happy as heretofore. One morning when spring was smiling everywhere else he felt quite irresistibly drawn to go and see what sort of a face she presented there. So he went again and, Great Cæsar! how awful they were now! There were puddles of liquids such as he knew no name for, and dead rats, and so forth. It almost made him sick, and really made him heartsick. He stuck to it until he had gone the whole rounds, and the house at the end of the rounds was the worst of all; in fact, was quite too bad for description. He paused, balancing himself on a broken brick, to look upon its most unwholesome appearance; and then, to his astonishment, he noticed that the window of the wretched place was clean. As none of the windows were ever clean, he at once went close to see what ailed this one; and then, looking through it, saw to his great surprise a girl inside, sweeping. Not only a girl inside sweeping, but a young and pretty girl, too. Turning just then, she saw him too, and came to the door at once. He didn't know who she was, and of course she didn't know who he was; but each bowed, and smiled pleasantly upon the other.

"What are you doing here?" he asked, promptly. She looked slightly alarmed, suspecting quickly that he was the agent. "Why, can't I live here?" she asked. "The people told me that no one had had this house all winter."

Jerry looked at her in amazement. She was so pretty and spoke so clearly and sweetly. "You don't want to live here," he told her. "Why, you can't!"

"Oh, but I do want to. I have a special reason for wanting to. Pray, pray let me."

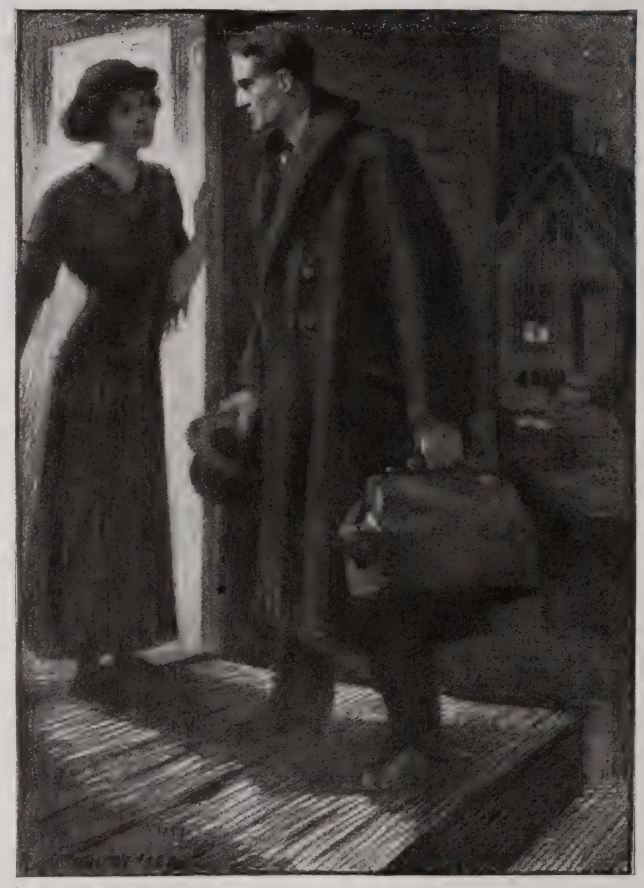
He stared in redoubled amazement at that.

"But it's such a hole of a place," he protested.



Drawing by Wilson Dexter

"'I'm awfully ill; I'm dying of something—I don't know just what'"

"Not at all. One of the men has helped me mend the roof, and my furniture is coming this afternoon. Please let me stay."

He could really hardly believe his ears. "You're crazy!" he told her.

"No, I'm not—" She shook her pretty head.

"Well, what are you, then?"

She smiled a little at that. "I don't see why you care," she said.

"I do care."

"Well, then, I sew."

He looked at her doubtfully. "I should think you'd want to live in some comfortable place."

"I'll make this comfortable. And it's the cheapest I can find."

"I don't understand a bit," he said. And he didn't.

"But I may stay?"

"Oh, yes; but I haven't anything to do with the houses."

It was her turn to stare at this direct contradiction in terms. "Oh, are you a settlement worker?" she queried, with parted lips.

"No," said Jerry, much confused at the very idea; "no, of course not. I—I was only out walking That's all, I assure you." Then, blushing vividly he hurried away.

It was only a week later that he received an invitation to go to Switzerland with some friends, and promptly vanished out of the particularly mundane sphere in which his unhappy houses lay.

It was mid-September when he finally returned, and the twilight was shortening fast. "I'm going to look at my houses the first thing," he told himself that evening at dinner, and about nine o'clock he set forth. He knew the way well by this time, but when he came there he thought that he must have forgotten it, for the houses seemed to have vanished. He stood still, looking about in the half-dark, feeling quite lost and bewildered, and then suddenly he saw her little hovel, and knew that he was right after all. It was only that there were so many clean windows now that he hadn't noticed hers among them, and then he perceived other changes. All the unsightly bunches of rags and hay were gone; all the panes were whole, and those which let no light through were darkened not by dirt but by curtains; real curtains, hanging up inside. Some miracle had been wrought here. The street under his feet was clean, too, and looking down its length, he saw twinkling lamp-posts winking at him from either side. He felt quite numb at first, dazed by the change. Then he walked slowly down the whole length of his property and back again, and when he found himself upon the spot from which he had set out he turned and stared deliberately into her window.

It was a common enough type of window, was her window—having eight oblong panes, four on either side of the dividing sash, and fresh white curtains, looped apart to show the room within. Oh, that room within! Jerry had never guessed that he owned such a place as the room within; and as he looked he became almost dizzy with pleasure at the thought that he did own it.

There was a small grate stove (the evening was very chill), and around it sat a whole row of children busy doing knitting and basket work. They were all the children of the neighbors, he felt sure, for their little intent faces reflected their nationality; but what his eyes noted quickest was their look of comfort, happiness and well-being. It lifted a great load from some sore spot in his make-up, for they looked as if the next time that he went to Europe he need not give them a thought.

And then, suddenly, his heart leaped into his mouth, for he perceived that one of them, made small like them by sitting on a stool while they sat on chairs, was the sweet, pretty girl who "sewed." She was busy with her hands, too, but she seemed to be telling a story to her eager little audience at the same time, and he found himself involuntarily drawing nearer to try to listen with the children. But he could not hear, because he was outside.

It was such a strange sensation to stand outside in the cold and look in at good cheer and happiness. It was an utterly new sensation to Jerry, who entirely forgot his own feelings in his interest at first, but soon remembered them because of a curious lump that arose in his throat. It came to him for the first time in his life how hard it is to stand outside in the cold; and then, when he had once begun to consider that viewpoint, the lump seemed to grow worse and worse until at last it forced him to about face and go home with something very wretched indeed weighing his heart to the very ground.

At home (which was no home, but a big, barren, and most luxurious club) he dreamed sad, sorry dreams all the night through, and the next morning knew that he had changed climates too quickly and was paying the common penalty of a most horrible cold. A man who lives at a club never has any one in particular to look out for him, so he spent a long day feeling a little worse each hour than the last, and late in the afternoon knew beyond a shadow of a doubt that he was very ill indeed. And then he progressed with frightful rapidity, his mother, who had been long dead, coming in to sit by him for a while, and people far away seeming to flutter near and then go lightly off again. And yet in spite of them all it was not until dinner time that he could screw himself up to any real resolution. By that time he knew, however, that if he was going to do anything vital he must be quick about it, and so he rolled off the sofa, pressed the two halves of his head together again, and set about packing at once.

It seemed unnecessary to take much, but he managed to get what would be called "first aid to the injured" out of his chest of drawers, even though his hands did shake horribly. And he put them more or less neatly up together in his bag. The bag wasn't as heavy as usual, because he was taking neither suits nor shoes; and he lifted it easily enough when he had on his overcoat and hat and was ready to leave his room.

"I'm off to my cousin's," he told the page in the hall outside as he hurried by him.

"Shall I call a cab, sir?" asked the door man, hurrying behind him.

"No, I'll take the tram," said Jerry, hurrying yet faster; "never mind about mail; I'll write."

What he was about to do was exceedingly unconventional, and rather uncomfortably near to being improper. But Jerry's fever was atrociously high by this time, and his brain altogether awhirl.

He distanced the door man completely. Outside it was bitter cold and the wind cut like a knife, but still he managed the tram and the transfer and the walk at the other end. The knowledge of how awfully well off he was going to be soon kept him up through everything. He could just feel the warmth and see how her face would smile as he fell asleep—happy—happy. It made him fairly dizzy to think how happy.

When he reached the little house the curtain was parted as usual, the bright stove glowed within, and she was sitting at a table writing a letter. He had just strength enough left to get to the door and to rap.

She came at once and when she saw who it was she started, quite frankly.

"I'm awfully ill," Jerry said, lifting his hat with his shaking hand; "I'm dying of something—I don't just know what. Please take me in and take care of me, and I'll work on settlements all the rest of my days."

She gave two quick steps backward and he went on in. He hardly knew what followed. An Italian, a boy with bright white teeth, came from somewhere and helped him to undress, and rubbed his hands. And then something deliciously warm and woolly heaped itself against his freezing feet and life seemed to surge back through him with hammer-strokes that cut his lungs to shreds. Then he smelt onions and was dragged about and half pulled to bits. And then all of a sudden a great hot steaming mass sank down upon him, soaking up all the pain and smothering him to sleep.

If it was death he didn't care, for he knew that all that happened would be of her ordering, and he liked all her ways. And he was inside now and, oh, heavens above!—it is good to be inside!

He woke up again some time. And what he woke to was quite the stickiest environment that he had ever known. His first thought was that he had been drowned in an unbaked bread pudding. And next he saw that she stood by the narrow little bed, smiling at his discomfort.

"What is it?" he asked, looking up at her and trying to smile, too. Because, of course, if she was there, whatever was, was all right.

"It's an old-fashioned sure cure for acute pneumonia," she said, in the most matter-of-fact of tones; "if taken in time the worst case can be cured. You take a lot of onions and a lot of cornmeal and boil them together and dump the whole mess into a pillowcase and pack a person's chest and throat for twenty-four hours and they wake up cured."

"Am I cured?" asked Jerry.

"Almost," she said, laughing; "but you mustn't talk."

"I knew you could do it," said Jerry, happily; "I'll be good—I won't talk." And then he shut his eyes and kept his word, his happiness being just a bit more acute than his pneumonia.

When he awoke next time the white-toothed Italian boy came in to tend him, but She came too. He felt so happy that he didn't mind a thing, not his pudding chest-protector, not even his room, which was illegal in that it had no window and yet was used for sleeping. They helped the illegality by putting a blanket over him often and making the air fresh by opening all through from front to back, and in between he wondered how she had turned the dirty black hole that formed the central feature of this especial tenement into such a clean, sweet, neat little white room, with narrow iron bed, four bracketed shelves, and a set of dolly-drawers screwed to the door so that when it opened they vanished.

"It's all so pretty," he said like a pleased child, when she came in another time.

"Homes are always pretty," she smiled back.

'I knew you could do anything," he assurred her irrelevantly.

"Don't talk!" she bid him as usual.

Another day or so passed.

"Now tell me," she said one noon as she fed him his delicious Scotch broth, "how did you come to come here that night? I want so much to know."

"I don't know myself," he confessed frankly. "I just know that when I realized how awfully badly off I was I got up and packed and came."

"It seems so odd. You didn't know that I'd ever been a trained nurse, did you?"

"I didn't know a thing about you."

"And I don't know a thing about you, now."

Jerry quite jumped. "Don't you, really?" he stammered. "Why, I thought that of course you knew me, now."

"But I don't," she said. "It's all a mystery to me. I know nothing. Not even your name. Nothing."

"How most awfully funny!" he commented. "But it's nice, too. You must like me just as I like you—for myself alone."

He thought that she blushed a little, and he tried to be sure, but the light was so defective in that middle room! He saw suddenly why every room in the world should have at least one good window.

"I do wonder how you ever came to know that I could take care of the sick," she said, again.

"Perhaps I didn't know," said Jerry; "perhaps I just wanted to see whether you could or not."

She laughed a little at that and left him at once. He slept a while and when he woke he could hear her in the kitchen getting the goodies together for his tea. Oh, he was happy! Talk about Monte Carlo or the delights of motoring through Spain by moonlight! Why, they were not to be mentioned in the same breath with this pneumonia of his.

What Some Clever Girls Did

Saved enough last year to buy new furs this winter by using Diamond Dyes.

"—It sounds funny, I know, but out of our dress allowances we each saved enough to buy new furs this winter, and we were all better dressed than ever before. We dyed our last season's clothes in all the latest fashionable colors and made them over into new styles."

So writes Miss Dorothy Johnson, one of a number of New York girls who, by using Diamond Dyes, dress in the latest style, and yet spend very little money on new clothes.

You, too, with these wonderful first aids to fashion, can easily make your clothes constantly beautiful.

Also, you can give new life and color to your curtains, rugs, portières, etc., and your laces and trimmings can be used over and over again, through the magic of

Diamond Dyes

There are two classes of Diamond Dyes—one for Wool or Silk, the other for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods. Diamond Dyes for Wool or Silk now come in Blue envelopes. And, as heretofore, those for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods are in White envelopes.

Here's the Truth About Dyes for Home Use

Our experience of over thirty years has proven that no one dye will successfully color every fabric.

There are two classes of fabrics—animal fibre fabrics and vegetable fibre fabrics:

Wool and Silk are animal fibre fabrics. Cotton and Linen are vegetable fibre fabrics. "Union" or "Mixed" goods are 60% to 80% Cotton — so must be treated as vegetable fibre fabrics.

Vegetable fibres require one class of dye, and animal fibres another and radically different class of dye. As proof—we call attention to the fact that manufacturers of woolen goods use one class of dye, while manufacturers of cotton goods use an entirely different class of dye.

Do Not Be Deceived

For these reasons we manufacture one class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, and another class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Wool or Silk, so that you may obtain the very best results on EVERY fabric.

REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods.

AND REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Wool or Silk, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Wool or Silk.

Diamond Dyes are sold at the uniform price of 10c. per package.

The tray (when she brought it) was tin with a plain white napkin, and today he had jelly and white chicken-meat, and two whole cups of tea with four lumps of sugar. He fairly writhed in joy.

"In three days more you can have a carriage and go home," she told him, as she fed him his bits of sandwich with a fork. (So nice to be fed!)

"Oh, I say!" he cried blankly.

"Where is your home?" she asked calmly.

"I haven't any."

"Where do you keep your clothes, then?"

He looked almost reproachful. "Don't spoil the fairy story by such questions. I don't want to tell."

"But I must know. Surely some one is worried over you?"

"No," he said. "I'm quite alone. On my honor."

"But you must go somewhere soon," she protested. "You are almost well. You've got to go back to where you belong."

He looked so disconsolate that she laughed again.

"Tell me how you managed to change all their habits," he said, seeking to open some other channel of converse.

"The neighborhood had such a bad name," she said, "and I belong to a sisterhood that like to go and try their hands at the impossible. One takes a little settlement and then one makes of oneself an example while one works like a dog. I used to be patching my house and raking my street from dawn to dark, and after a while some others began to try their hands at the same work too."

"How nice!" said Jerry. "More jam, please."

"And now I'm hoping when the landlord returns to get him to build some rows of nice new little places and let them at the same price as these."

"But he can't, you see," said Jerry quickly. "That's the difficulty. If he builds better houses he'll have to have more money for them."

"That isn't the Golden Rule," said his nurse.

"The Golden Rule doesn't apply to tenements," said Jerry.

"No," said his pretty nurse, smiling; "it only applies to men with pneumonia, I suppose."

Jerry gave a sharp little gasp; something keener than any pneumonia pain clove his soul at that word of hers. He'd never thought of that. And a shattered soul is like a shattered window in that it lets in a lot of God's very own fresh air.

"I wish that the landlord who owns these houses would come to me ill," the nurse went on. "I'd not lose any time converting him, I know."

"Oh, dear me!" said Jerry, feeling battered to bits by the double stress of his own emotions and her further words. "I own 'em. I'm the landlord. Build them over to suit yourself. I've never liked the way they looked."

Any ordinary girl would have dropped the whole tea-tray on him at such a revelation, but this was no ordinary girl. This was an extraordinary girl, an exceptionally clear-headed, earnest, well-trained Doer of Good.

After she had sat still for a long ten seconds, regarding him with extreme amazement, she took up the last bit of sandwich and tucked it carefully into his mouth. "I was told that these houses belonged to a horrid old man," she said slowly.

"He was my uncle. He died and left 'em to me," Jerry explained.

"What did you think of them when you first saw them?" she asked.

"I thought they were abominable, and I said so, too. I wanted to pull them all down, but my agent told me that these people were all content with them as they were and couldn't afford to pay more."

She gazed at him meditatively. "And kind-hearted people have given me my living and the money I needed to make the houses livable and the people who lived in them comfortable," she said. "How droll! Why, they've even supplied the money that nursed you and bought what you needed. What a lesson in economics and supplemented earnings!"

No darkness could hide the blaze in Jerry's face at that, although he had very vague ideas as to economics and supplemented earnings.

"And you never thought of how grand it would be to build some decent houses that didn't pay!" she continued. "Really, there is one thing that sometimes contradicts the law of gravitation, and that's money. Money sometimes is regarded as being obliged always to flow upward."

The nurse watched him blaze. "I do wonder how you'll ever pay this debt now!" she said.

Then he quite boiled over. "I'll do it very easily," he declared, in a tone whose complete assurance surprised even himself. "I'll put up something so good that it'll serve as a model for all the other houses around here, and I'll marry you."

She jumped to her feet. "Marry me!" she cried. "Oh! oh!"

"Yes, indeed," said Jerry. "I've only just begun to see how it all worked in together. It was what made me come here the night I was ill, or it was fate, or it was that Golden Rule of yours, I'm sure I don't know which—or care either."

"Oh!" gasped the nurse. (She hadn't jumped so far but that he was holding her hand with all the latent strength which Scotch broth, jam and white chicken-meat naturally impart). "Oh! oh!"

"It's a real fairy story," Jerry declared, "or else—as I said before, it's your Golden Rule. Please take your choice—whichever you say."

And she did.

Popularizing Sanitation

WHAT is every man's business is no man's business" is a fallacy, for to succeed as a community, every man must make the general business of the community his own special business. This is the one thing needed to secure purer politics, if not more efficient public officials. In no one thing—and we regard it as the most promising of signs—has interest been more generally awakened and individual effort been more readily contributed than in the enforcement and observance of sanitary laws. A French writer of thirty years ago—with more truth than satire—described us as "a nation of spitters." This disgusting disease-spreading habit has not been wholly suppressed in this country, but even the unobservant must have noticed a change for the better that has taken place in the last few years. A study of the municipal ordinances of all our cities shows that the public has come to realize that "prevention is better than cure," and so laws have been passed, not only against the practice just referred to, but also for the cleaning and disinfecting of public conveyances and the better sanitation of dwellings. But no matter how exacting or beneficial the law, it must remain a dead letter, unless approved by the majority. Surely, if only from self-interest, the majority should make every effort to preserve its own life.

HOW A BOY AIDED THE BREAD LINE

Inclosed you will find $2.55 for your rescue work. I am a little boy (aged 11) and could not give the money myself, so I thought that I could go around and ask some people for some money for the Bowery Mission. I thought that it would be better to send what I had gotten so far, for I thought that you would need it more when it is so cold, than later on. I will try to get more money for you as soon as possible.

You Can Weigh Exactly What You Should Weigh

The Simplest Gown looks well on a Figure of Correct Proportion if Carried Well.

My pupils are among the most refined, intellectual women of America. They have regained health and good figures and learned how to keep well. Each has given me a few minutes a day in the privacy of her own room to following scientific, hygienic principles of health, prescribed to suit each individual's needs.

No Drugs—No Medicines

My work has grown in favor because results are quick, natural and permanent and because they are scientific and appeal to common sense.

Be well—nothing short of well.

Radiate Health—so that every one with whom you come in contact is permeated with your strong spirit, your wholesome personality—feels better in body and mind for your very presence.

Be Attractive—well groomed.

Improve Your Figure—in other words be at your best. You wield a stronger influence for good, for education, for wholesome right living, if you are attractive and well, graceful and well poised—upright in body as well as in mind—and you are happier.

I want to help every woman to realize that her health lies, to a degree, in her own hands, and that she can reach her ideal in figure and poise.

Judge what I can do for you by what I have done for others.

I think I do not exaggerate when I say I have corrected more Chronic Ailments and built up and reduced more women during the past nine years than any physician—the best physicians are my friends—their wives and daughters are my pupils. I have Reduced about 25,000 women from 10 to 85 lbs. I have rounded out and Increased the weight of as many more—all this by strengthening nerves, heart, circulation, lungs vital organs so as to regulate the assimilation of food.

Won't you join us?—we will make you and the world better.

I have published a free booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly, and giving other information of vital interest to women. Write for it and I will also tell you about my work. If you are perfectly well and your figure is just what you wish, you may be able to help a dear friend—at least you will help me by your interest in this great movement of health and figure through natural means.

Sit down and write to me NOW. Don't wait—you may forget it.

I have had a wonderful experience, and I should like to tell you about it.

Moody and the Burglar

VALENTINE BURKE was a burglar. Twenty years he had spent in prison. He was a big fellow, with a hard face, and a terrible tongue for swearing, especially at sheriffs and jailers.

Twenty-five years or more ago (writes H. M. Hamill), Evangelist Moody was young, and not long in his ministry. He came to St. Louis to lead a revival meeting, and the Globe-Democrat announced that it was going to print every word he said, sermon, prayer and exhortation. Burke was in the St. Louis jail, awaiting trial. Confinement was wearing on him, and he put in his time railing at the guards. Somebody threw a paper into his cell, and the first thing that caught his eye was a head-line like this: "How the jailer at Philippi got caught." He sat down with a chuckle to read the story of the jailer's discomfiture.

"Philippi!" he said, "that's up in Illinois. I've been in that town."

The reading had a strange look, out of the usual newspaper way. It was Moody's sermon of the night before. "What rot is this?" asked Burke. "Paul and Silas—a great earthquake—'what must I do to be saved?' Has the paper got to printing such stuff?" Burke threw the paper down with an oath, and walked about his cell like a caged lion. By and by he took up the paper and read the sermon through. The restless fit grew on him. Again and again he picked up the paper and read its strange story. It was then that something came into his heart and cut its way to the quick. "What does it mean?" he asked. "Twenty years and more I've been a burglar and jailbird, but I never felt like this. What is it to be saved, anyway? I've lived a dog's life, and I'm getting tired of it. If there is such a God as that preacher is telling about, I'll find out if it kills me to do it." He found it out. Toward midnight, after hours of broken prayers, and bitter remorse over his wasted life, Burke learned that there is a God who is able and willing to blot out the darkest and bloodiest record.

Next morning when the guard came round Burke had a pleasant word for him, and the guard eyed him in wonder. When the sheriff came, Burke greeted him as a friend, and told him how he had found God, after reading Moody's sermon. "Jim," said the sheriff to the guard, "you'd better keep an eye on Burke. He's playing the pious dodge, and the first chance he gets he will be out of here." In a few weeks Burke came to trial; but the case failed and he was released.

Friendless, and known only as a daring criminal, he had a hard time for months. Men looked at his face when he asked for work, and upon its evidence turned him away. But Burke was as brave as a Christian as he had been as a burglar, and struggled on. Seeing that his sin-blurred features were against him, he asked the Lord "if he wouldn't make him a better-looking man, so that he could get an honest job." Something or somebody really answered the prayer, for Moody said a year from that time when he met Burke he was as fine a looking man as he knew.

Shifting to and fro, wanting much to find steady work, Burke went to New York, hoping far from his old haunts to find honest labor. He did not succeed, and came back to St. Louis, much discouraged, but still holding fast to God. One day there came a message from the sheriff that he was wanted at the courthouse, and Burke obeyed with a heavy heart.

"Some old case they've got against me," he said; "but if I'm guilty I'll tell them so. I'm done lying."

The sheriff greeted him kindly.

"Where have you been, Burke?"

"In New York."

"What have you been doing there?"

"Trying to find a decent job," said Burke.

"Have you kept a good grip on the religion you told me about?" inquired the sheriff.

"Yes," answered Burke, looking him steadily in the eye, "I've had a hard time, sheriff, but I haven't lost my religion."

It was then the tide began to turn.

"Burke," said the sheriff, "I have had you shadowed every day you were in New York. I suspected that your religion was a fraud. But I know you've lived an honest Christian life, and I have sent for you to offer you a deputyship under me. You can begin at once."

He began. Steadily the old burglar went about his duties, until men high in business began to tip their hats to him, and to talk of him at their clubs. Moody was passing through the city and stopped off to meet Burke, who loved nobody as he did the man who converted him. Moody found him in a room in the courthouse serving as a guard over a bag of diamonds. Burke sat with the gems in his lap and a gun on the table. There were $60,000 worth of diamonds in the sack.

"Moody," he said, "see what the grace of God can do for a burglar. Look at this! The sheriff picked me out to guard it." Then he cried like a child as he held up the glittering stones for Moody to see.

Years afterward the churches of St. Louis were waiting for the coming of an evangelist; but something happened and he did not come. One of the pastors suggested that Valentine Burke lead the meetings. Burke led night after night, and many hard men of the city came to hear him, and many were turned from lives of crime to clean Christian living.

Fry Onions then potatoes in the same Crisco The potatoes will not taste of the onions

THE fact that Crisco, the new cooking product, does not absorb odors or flavors is unusually interesting to everyone. It seems so improbable that it is difficult for people to appreciate that it is true.

All that is necessary is to fry onions in Crisco, strain the Crisco through a cloth, then fry potatoes in the same Crisco. To make the test thoroughly convincing, taste the potatoes first, and you cannot detect even a suggestion of the flavor of onion.

By straining Crisco you can use and re-use it. Not a drop need be thrown away. This one advantage alone makes the use of Crisco a decided economy.

You can heat Crisco very much hotter than you can lard, without causing it to burn or smoke. No distasteful "frying odor" fills your dining room and kitchen, and you will find that in addition to tasting better, the foods are the most tempting, appetizing fried foods you have ever seen — crisp and deliciously dry.

On request, we shall mail a fully illustrated booklet, showing many other advantages of Crisco.

Among the Workers

—THE WORLD'S SEVENTH Sunday School Convention will be held in Zurich, Switzerland, July 8-15, 1913.

AT GRANGEVILLE, IDA., a notable revival is under way, conducted by Evangelist J. D. Taylor. Crowds are coming from long distances. Many conversions are reported.

—THE PRESBYTERIAN MISSIONARIES in Northwestern Persia write that conditions of famine and destitution prevail in Tabriz. The city has been in a state of semi-siege. Business is at a standstill and thousands are out of employment owing to the war. Many are begging for bread in the streets. The need for relief is very urgent.

—THE SCANDINAVIAN ALLIANCE MISSION (Swedish Branch), at Piet Retief, Transvaal, South Africa, is making an effort to build a church, with class-rooms for native workers. Superintendent K. A. Hjelm will answer any inquiries from American friends who desire to help the work. The mission is making excellent progress.

—MRS. M. A. CHURCH, Walcott, N. Y., writes of Pandita Ramabai's Mission at Kedgaon, India: "There are there at the present time 500 Christian women trained and ready for preaching work. They are conversant with the customs and language of many of the provinces of India, but they lack means to make their work effective. If they could be sent out, they would go very far toward solving the problem how to reach India's millions." Mrs. Church spent five months at Mukhti, in evangelistic work. She came in frequent contact with the Pandita's colony and was impressed with its wonderful spiritual possibilities.

—THE SIX WEEKS' revival campaign led by Dr. French E. Oliver in Butler, Pa., closed February 14. Many conversions are reported. Twelve churches united in this effort. The city was districted in advance and from thirty to forty prayer meetings held weekly.

—MISSIONARY CARL W. COOPER, of Sao Paulo, Brazil, writes: "In October, 1908, you printed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the story of 'Little Blossom'—a poor, starving and almost dead baby. It was in Cachoeirinha that she came to us, one of a multitude of waifs to be found in this land. Her mother, who was part Indian, became insane, and gave her apparently dying baby to Mrs. Cooper. Through the rescue of 'Little Blossom,' God spoke to us of giving our lives to the care of other children without parents or home. Now, for two years, the 'Blossom Home' has been a blessed reality. The one Blossom has increased to twenty-five other Blossoms."

OUR COMFORT CORNER

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Stranger in the Pulpit

CONGREGATIONS have a natural preference for the voice to which they are accustomed, and the presence of a stranger in the pulpit is accepted by the people in the pews with an air of resignation. They would much rather listen to their own minister. The visiting stranger must overcome their apathy, and if he is sensitive to atmosphere he is aware of the indifference that is likely to act as a chill upon his eloquence. The speaker on the platform is often made or marred by the audience. A cold, critical or hostile audience greatly embarrasses the unfortunate person who must address it. Many constant and loyal church-goers avail themselves of an announced absence on the part of the pastor to make an excursion to another church. They have wanted for some time to hear a popular minister whose magnetism and fervor are attracting great crowds. The habit of being at home in church is strong, and they do not easily break its bonds. The wife will say to the husband or the husband to the wife, "As Dr. L. will not be here to-day, let us give ourselves the pleasure of listening to Dr. W. This is a chance we may not have again very soon."

If the pastor of one's own church is consulted he will say from his heart, "Go away if you wish when I am in the pulpit, but if you care for me and my work be in your place when I am exchanging with some one else." Above everything, remain where you ought to be when you happen to know that an important cause of missions or philanthropy is to be presented by a visiting secretary of a church board.

The minister has a little pride in letting his friend from without see that he has a full congregation. He likewise has an earnest wish that his congregation may be interested in the benevolence, whatever it may be, for which a contribution is asked. In brief, when there is a stranger in the pulpit it behooves every member of the church and congregation to display something of the courtesy of host and hostess to the visitor.

A point in church manners frequently overlooked is to pay attention to what is being said by the man in the pulpit. When the Scriptures are read and prayer is offered, it is a violation of reverence to the Lord himself and to his house of praise either to look about, whisper or fidget. During announcements, if these must be made, and during the progress of a sermon that does not get hold of the listener, there are people who open the hymn book and turn its leaves, furtively write on a pad or the flyleaf, address a remark in a low tone to a neighbor, or, most glaring impropriety of all, consult a watch and replace it with a snap. The rudeness that may be seen in churches would not be tolerated in any one's drawing-room and is indulged in by those who consider themselves immune from observing politeness and practicing it when they are in a crowd. They have not, in fact, the faintest intention of annoying the speaker, and they are oblivious to the effect their example has on those around them.

The visiting minister is usually worth hearing. Sometimes he gives the congregation a stimulating discourse and often his words linger with a restful charm and a residuum of comfort long after the morning has passed.

Early Helps in Sickness

THE doctor may be summoned by telephone and will come quickly in his motor-car in answer to a hurry call, yet there are precautions that may be taken and things that may be done if there is need for haste before he arrives. If some one has unfortunately taken a dose of poison instead of a harmless remedy keep the bottle until the doctor comes. If a chill, usually a danger signal, asserts itself, get hot blankets, a hot water bag and a warm drink, and see what may be done to start the circulation anew. If somebody faints, remember that a recumbent position is essential, and give the fainting person air. There is no need to dash a stream of cold water in her face. A course in First Aid to the Injured should be taken by every young woman. She can never tell when it may be necessary for her to know what to do and how to do it in an emergency. A few simple remedies properly labeled should be in the family medicine closet. Tincture of arnica, extract of witch hazel and listerine, also tincture of myrrh and essence of peppermint should form part of the domestic stock in pharmacy. An alarming attack of acute indigestion may be relieved before the physician can be brought, by means of essence of peppermint, bi-carbonate of soda and hot water. A burn or scald may be quickly relieved by an application of linseed oil and lime-water, and if nothing else is at hand, ordinary flour covering the burned place from the surrounding air may be relied upon to soothe the pain.

Queen Esther's Tomb

MISS ANNIE MONTGOMERY, a missionary in Hamadan, Persia, sends the following interesting letter. It will have a peculiar interest for those who last year studied the story of Esther in the Sunday School, and for those who have recently been reading about the beautiful queen in The Women of the Bible.

"I have been so interested in what you have written about the customs still remaining in the East that I thought you might be interested to hear a few facts about the queer old city in which beautiful Esther must have had her summer home, where she most likely died, and without doubt was buried, as her grave 'is with us to this day.' As the great Frenchman, M. De Morgan, was assured by his explorations that Hamadan is the ancient Ecbatana, and that on the hill just outside of the present city was the summer palace of the kings, we would have little reason to question the site. A much stronger proof that here are the graves of Esther and her grand old uncle Mordecai, is in the fact that in the shrine which the Jews count so sacred, and between the graves, a light has always been kept burning. When we studied the story of Esther's self-sacrifice for her people, I took our teachers to see the graves and, alas! they found that the very interesting railing with its curious old decorations above Esther's grave had been burned up. The keeper suggested that it had taken fire from the lamp, but the story is not believed. Many people think the fence was stolen.

"Three years ago the keeper of the shrine came to our good Dr. Funk for treatment. His leg had been badly injured. Some time after it was discovered that the coffer that had always been suspended from the center of the dome by a chain had disappeared. Examination showed that a ladder had been placed against the wall, and had left its mark as it had fallen. As the Jews believed that the coffer held the crown that once adorned Esther's beautiful head, they were terribly angry with the keeper who had betrayed his trust. He was sent to Tehran and imprisoned, and if the one who bought his plunder does not divulge the secret, no one will ever know what the coffer contained, for the keeper died in prison.

"It was curious to find when I came here that the king's brother, who was governor, had for his favorite wife a beautiful Jewess. In the same queer old town—Hamadan—was found the first edict of Cyrus when Darius commanded that 'search be made in the house of the rolls.' A curious thing it seems to worship Sabbath after Sabbath in a church that holds a similar 'firman' from the King of kings, Naseredin Shah. When this edict was granted he made the first grant ever given to a Protestant church by a king of Persia, and the edict closed with the same command as that given to the Jews that prayer be made for the king and his sons. So in our church on the Lord's Day, and in our homes every day, we pray for the little king who needs wisdom more than Solomon ever had. One of the many sources of gladness among the thousandfold promised to the missionary, is that any one living in this Bible land can understand the Bible as never before. When you deal with people who must have a 'baysman' you understand so much better the intercession of the Lord Jesus and the beauty of the figure. When I have been roused at midnight again and again with the cry, 'Behold, the bridegroom cometh!' and I have rushed into the church to light it up for the advancing procession, the parable of the foolish ones who took no oil had a vivid impression, and one feels the sorrowful case of those who cannot hope for any blessing when the heavenly 'Bridegroom cometh.'

"Many people have criticized the Hebrews of the Exodus for borrowing from their Egyptian neighbors, and thought of them as dishonest. You will never think so again when those who are starting on a journey come and ask you to supply them with necessities for the way, as a matter of course, that you may receive a blessing from the travelers. The Egyptians knew how the Israelites had been oppressed and robbed, and I am sure they wanted them to go out and leave a blessing with them."

Opposites in Marriage

THE best outfit for permanent happiness in marriage is the possession of those who, loving each other devotedly, and having essentially the same creed and high principles of honor, are opposites in temperament. Every one has noticed that husbands and wives who have lived together in harmony for many years, have gradually become like one another in expression. Originally, there may have been no similarity in feature or look, but the tender shaping of the years, mind and heart responding in sympathy, has brought out in the faces a certain sign of the blending of character.

A distinguished literary man whose wife was not especially fond of books, while she gave her home the hovering care of the mother-bird for the nest, said one day to a friend, "How grateful I am to Providence that I have not a wife who wants to be in the same line of business that I am." He was right. It is much better that there should not be rivalry or competition in the partnership of wife and husband, and it is better, too, in consideration of the inheritance to be passed on to children that the qualities of the parents should not be precisely the same. When husband and wife are endowed with brilliant genius, their children are often commonplace, and it may require a generation or two for nature to get ready to repeat force and brightness in that family.

The newspapers reported the other day the rather alarming fact that in one little seaside town of this country, known as a fashionable rallying place much favored by millionaires, there were pending seventy-four cases of divorce. The inquiry is inevitable: Why are there so many instances of dissatisfaction, dishonor and desire to escape from the bond where homes are replete with luxury, and wealth abounds? Evidently luxury, idleness and ennui do not form a firm foundation for married happiness. Where two people work together, sharing life's ups and downs, where if one is buoyant to the extreme, the other maintains a calm poise; where one is quick and the other slow; where both are honest and unselfish, there is no appeal to the divorce court.

A Plea for Pockets

THE woman does not live who is not seriously inconvenienced because Fashion decrees that her gowns shall have no pockets. Independent women there are who insist upon pockets in their petticoats and who once in a great while persuade a dressmaker to tuck a pocket into some inaccessible portion of their dress. Outside wraps, it is true, have pockets, and so do negligees worn, as a rule, only in one's chamber. The other day a woman lamented the fact that she no longer wore a watch. She said that once upon a time she had been fortunate enough to have a little chamois-lined receptacle for a watch inserted in her dress where it could be concealed under a belt. This, by the majestic decree of Fate, was no longer her privilege, and as her watch was a sensible affair, too large to be carried on a hook as if it were a locket or a toy, she left it most of the time in her bureau drawer and usually forgot to wind it up. Women are obliged to dispose of many useful articles in their sleeves, or on the inner side of a corset, and they carry handbags everywhere, stuffed with a miscellaneous collection of letters, bills, coins, invitations, visiting cards and whatever else a bag can hold, while a man strides forth on his triumphant progress through life equipped for the fray with nearly two dozen pockets. On the day that a little chap assumes his first knee trousers and thrusts his hands into his pockets, he distinctly attains rank as a lord of creation. American women ought to make a stand, and insist on the cessation of a tyrannical custom which has not the faintest excuse for being.

A Beautiful Poem

I DO not know who wrote these verses that give us busy women so needful a hint, but they have brought to me a tender warning, and so I am passing them on to the readers of this page:

WHEN I HAVE TIME

When I have time, so many things I'll do
To make this life more happy and more fair
For those whose lives are crowded now with care:
I'll help to lift them from their low despair,
When I have time.

When I have time, kind words and loving smiles
I'll give to those whose pathway runs through tears,
Who see no joy in all the coming years;
In many ways their weary lives I'll cheer,
When I have time.

When I have time, the friend I love so well
Shall know no more those weary, toiling days;
I'll lead her feet in pleasant paths always,
And cheer her heart with words of sweetest praise,
When I have time.

When you have time! The friend you hold so dear
May be beyond the reach of your intent—
May never know that you so kindly meant
To fill her dreary life with sweet content
When you had time.

Now is the time! Ah friend, no longer wait
To scatter loving smiles and words of cheer
To those around whose lives are now so drear;
They may not need you in the coming year;
Now is the time!

They collect mail from practically every post-office in the United States—and they sort this mail while traveling on express schedule —HOWARD time.

The whole American business system is built up on the saving of minutes.

The man who is unsuccessful is very likely one who is never sure what's o'clock.

It is the difference in temperament—in habit of mind—and in watches.

Now and for all, the HOWARD is the watch for the man whose time means money.

It is admittedly the finest practical watch in the world—made and adjusted to standards that have never been attained by any other timepiece.

A HOWARD Watch is always worth what you pay for it.

The price of each watch is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel (double roller) in a Crescent Extra or Boss Extra gold-filled case at $40, to the 23-jewel at $150—and the EDWARD HOWARD model at $350.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD Watch. Find the HOWARD jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know.

Questions and Answers

F. P. R., Hampden Highlands, Me. Please explain Ex. 35: 3.

The passage quoted means that no cooking or domestic work of any other description, involving the use of fire, was to be done on the Sabbath day. This particular prohibition is still observed in orthodox Jewish homes, where, if a fire be necessary for warmth on the Sabbath in winter, it is built up before the Sabbath begins and may be lighted by a servant of any other race or religion, but not by an orthodox Hebrew.

I. J. P., Burley, Idaho. What does the word "stick" mean in Ezek. 37: 16-20? A man preached that "stick" means book, since a scroll was rolled on a stick.

In those ancient days it was a common custom to use billets and staves of wood for writing upon, and it is this to which Ezekiel refers. This practice was found among many of the primitive nations. We find it as early as the time of Moses (see Num. 17: 6) when the writing was done on rods. The laws of Solon were preserved by the Greeks on billets of wood called axones. These sticks, after being written upon, were strung together in a kind of frame or table for convenience in reading. In early English history, the Bardic compositions were recorded in stick-books. Something of the same character was doubtless used by the Jews in Ezekiel's time.

M. E. S., Reedsburg, Wis. The work of foreign missions is increasing every year. Every Protestant denomination is striving to fulfil the "Great Commission" to preach the Gospel to all nations, and we believe every gift of money for missionary purposes is honestly and judiciously administered to this end. If you take into account the fact that the missionaries, white and native, now constitute a large army, the sums allotted for their support are comparatively small in the aggregate. Send for the Year Books of the various denominations, which tell how the money is disbursed.

G. M. H., Goff, Kan. 1. Please explain the meaning of "compelling them to come," as used in Luke 14: 23. 2. Also "the first resurrection" (Rev. 20: 5). Matt. 25 indicates the just and unjust coming to judgment together.

1. The advice is to use the logic of compulsion in order to overcome the excuses that might be made: that they were not properly dressed for a visit, or were otherwise unprepared. It means to accept no excuse, but to bring them in just as they are. It is "godly persuasion," not violence, that is meant. 2. The first resurrection is the resurrection of the just. John saw them in his vision, not only when restored to life but in the act of reviving (see verse 4). It does not refer to the bodily general resurrection, but to the martyrs and saints and others who had suffered and who had passed from death unto life. The passage in Matt. 25 refers to the general resurrection and the judgment.

S. R. R., New York. Christ's kingdom was not of this world; it was a spiritual kingdom, and his teachings concerned the things of that kingdom, although occasionally, in parable and simile, he drew his illustrations from conditions within the circle of his hearers' knowledge. The fact that a scientist should refer disparagingly to Jesus' knowledge of art, science, politics and legislation is of little consequence; yet we have evidence that he was the master of all knowledge. Even as a child, he taught the learned men in the temple and expounded to them the sacred books in a way that amazed them, "speaking with authority."

Mrs. C. M., Pueblo, Colo. Can you recommend a supplemental question book covering the contents of the Bible which could be used in Sunday School work or for independent Bible study?

Sell's Bible Study by Book, published by Fleming H. Revell, New York, covers this ground. It is one of a set of eight volumes by Professor Sell entitled Supplemental Bible Studies. A. J. Hollman, Philadelphia, publishes 4,000 Bible Questions and Answers. Price's Syllabus of Old Testament History covers the books of the Old Testament.

A CHRISTIAN HERALD reader in Canada sends this contribution to the record of Biblical blunders: "At a schoolhouse near Maple Creek, Saskatchewan, a few weeks ago, the teacher had been describing in a graphic way the tree of knowledge in the middle of the Garden of Eden, and had been telling the scholars that the tree was fenced about to keep off Adam and Eve and all creatures, and finished with the question: 'Now, what happened when this tree of knowledge was fenced in?' A boy reared in the States seven years of age answered: 'George Washington jumped over the fence with his ax and cut the tree down.' Consternation in the class followed this unexpected answer."

J. H. W., Bowersville, Ga. How and by whom was the record kept from the beginning of time by the Israelites?

There is no trace of anything like a scientific view of chronology in Hebrew literature. They dealt usually with national and local epochs. Their long genealogical tables are practically useless for the purpose of chronology. Besides, the Bible does not aim to give a complete history of all time, but only of historic periods to which it refers. In the opening sentence, we find simply the words "in the beginning." The chronological references which are found on the margins of most Bibles, are those of Archbishop Usher (1580-1656), who reckoned backward from the birth of Christ as far as available history permitted. In Hebrew reckoning, according to Josephus the historian, from Adam to Noah (constituting the era of the patriarchs) is treated as one historic period and from the flood to the call of Abraham as another. Unquestionably, the Jewish chronology is comparatively complete from this latter date. The next important chronological guide-posts are the Exodus, the Judges, the period of the kingdom and the captivity.

Mrs. W. H. W., Ports, Kan. While the natural sorrow that is the result of the wrongs inflicted upon us by others cannot wholly be forgotten, we are enabled, through living near to God, to bear such griefs better and to feel them less keenly. We also take a different view of them and make larger allowances for the weaknesses of others. Our own hearts are filled with pity more than anger; we feel that we can pray sincerely and with love for our enemies, that they may be brought to see the wrong they have done. The true Christian is not vexed by the desire for retaliation, but accepts such treatment as a measure of discipline, and, by God's grace, begins to feel not only forgiveness but love for the wrongdoer and a sincere desire for his repentance and enlightenment. This experience is a familiar one to every Christian at some time or other. We should pray to be enabled to overcome all feelings of antagonism and emulate the example of Him who said, "Love your enemies . . . and pray for them that despitefully use you" (Luke 6: 27, 28). Love will triumph in the end.

F. S., Bridgeton, N. J. Was Zipporah the wife of Moses a negro woman? Were the Midianites colored people? I saw a letter in a newspaper a few days ago saying that she was a negress, also the "Queen of Sheba." Were they both colored women?

Zipporah was one of the seven daughters of Reuel or Jethro, the priest of Midian, and was no doubt of dark or reddish complexion, like the people of her country, but not a negress by any means. Sheba is in Arabia and its people are also of reddish complexion, not unlike that of the people of Syria to-day.

Subscriber, Pontotoc, Miss. 1. What is the meaning of I. Cor. 14: 34 and I. Tim. 2: 12? 2. How do you harmonize I. John 1: 8 and 3: 6-8?

1. There were certain things which Paul spoke, as he himself admitted, not "by authority," but as personal opinion or advisement. Among these were his remarks concerning women in the early church and woman's place in public affairs generally. Both of the passages mentioned are of this character. Yet, even in the early church, there were many noble women who have been immortalized on account of their service to Christianity. Paul was probably influenced in what he said by what he had witnessed in Corinth and Athens, where a certain class of women, not Christian but heathen, were undesirably prominent, and he took the extreme view in the other direction to warn the women of the Christian church against emulating such notoriety. In our own day, when consecrated women have rendered splendid service in advancing the Kingdom, the situation is altogether different. Such criticisms as those that related to the Corinthian and Athenian women have very little modern applicability. 2. This has been dealt with in a recent issue of THE MAIL-BAG.

C. E. C., Los Angeles, Calif. An Old Subscriber sends us the following: I note your statement under "Full Salvation," where you say, "No one is absolutely without sin (I. John 1: 8)." Won't you be kind enough to note that the eighth verse of I. John is between the seventh and the ninth? That the seventh verse says, "If [implying that we can] we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another [with Christ], and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin?" It is surely clear that if all sin is cleansed, none remains. But take the ninth verse: "If [implying that we can] we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." The Bible in another place says that "all unrighteousness is sin." So that, if we are cleansed from all unrighteousness, we are surely cleansed from all sin. Now, many people seem to desire to live in the eighth verse of I. John, but I prefer to live in the seventh or the ninth. If "no Christian is absolutely without sin," I ask with all sincerity, How much sin still remains in a Christian? Is it not a fact, that any sin, small or great, is dangerous? Is it consistent with the great plan of redemption to call Jesus a Saviour, when he cannot and does not absolutely save people from all sin? I have always supposed that, when the angel announced his name and that he was to be called Jesus—for he shall save his people from their sins (not in them)—he was rightly named. I have always supposed that when John said, "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world," that John meant all sin. I should like to know what the prophet meant when he was referring to Christ's kingdom and said, "I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean from all your filthiness, and from all your idols will I cleanse you."

W. J., Auburn, Me. I have been interested in the illustration of Jesus in the act of presenting a key to St. Peter and would like to have you explain the circumstance.

The passage referred to is Matt. 16: 19. This same promise was extended to all the apostles immediately afterward (see Matt. 18: 18 and John 20: 23), so that the claim of exclusive authority in the church made for Peter is not well founded, as the same power belonged equally to all the others. At the same time, in any literal and authoritative sense, this power was never exercised by any of the apostles. The power to intrude upon the relation between God and man is to be understood in a ministerial or declarative sense, as interpreting his Word, and not as though the power resided in themselves individually. Though Peter was the foremost of the apostolic band, nowhere does the record show a trace of any authority given to him or exercised by him above the rest of his brethren.

Mrs. L. H., Hudson, Wis. 1. How many Popes has the Roman Catholic Church had in all? 2. What is the explanation of the 18th verse of the 13th chapter of Revelation?

1. Bishop Siricius (in the fourth century) was the first to use the word "Pope" as a title, although the Roman Church claims twenty-nine earlier Popes. From Siricius (A.D. 398) to Pius X. there were 225 Popes. 2. This is one of the much-discussed passages ("the number of the beast") concerning which there have been many conjectures, without definite agreement. Some have interpreted it to mean Lateinos (the language of Rome), others Balaam (the false prophet). It was to be the symbol of the power of Antichrist—the number of the world given over to judgment.

Mrs. W. A., Scandia, Pa. Why was it necessary that blood should be spilled for remission of sin? (Heb. 9: 22.)

The laws of sin and salvation are not arbitrary matters, but are based on fixed principles, as rigid as those of any science. There could be no orderly universe without law, and the laws are not whims of God, but necessary forms of creation. It is one of those fundamental, axiomatic principles of the universe that sin brings forth death. When a sin is started something has to die. Righteousness leads to life; sin leads to death. The Old Testament sacrifices were only symbolic: they indicated by the death of animals the more tragic death of opportunity, of influence, of happiness, of the soul itself. They foreshadowed the great sacrifice to be made when the Son of God should bear, in his own infinite sufferings, all the results of the world's sin. There is mystery here, but so is there mystery in the cure of diphtheria by the blood of an animal which has been given the disease of which the patient is to be cured. The disease afflicts the animal, and the man who is inoculated will be saved. Just so sin brought forth the anguish of Christ, and "with his stripes we are healed."

Subscriber, Unionville, Conn. Will you kindly tell through THE MAIL-BAG the amount subscribed for the Klopsch Memorial and how or in what way the money is used for the Children's Home?

The total contributed for the Klopsch Memorial to date is approximately $21,000. This came very largely through the memorial subscription plan undertaken by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last summer. All the memorial contributions go toward an endowment fund, which is invested in interest-bearing securities of a character prescribed by the State laws governing the investment of charitable trust funds.

Reader, Sackville, Ont. Why is it wrong to have one's future told? Give texts from the Bible.

The Scriptures contain a number of emphatic passages warning those who seek after familiar spirits. Lev. 19: 31: "Regard not them that have familiar spirits, neither seek after wizards, to be defiled by them: I am the Lord thy God." Also Lev. 20: 6: II. Kings 21: 6: II. Chron. 33: 6; Isa. 29: 4, etc. After the establishment of Christianity, under Constantine, necromancy was placed under the ban of the church.

Happy Cozy Corner Days

A Garden All Your Own

Up rose the wild old Winter King.
And shook his beard of snow;
"I hear the first young harebell ring—
'Tis time for me to go."

MARCH, when all the world is full of new life and sunshine, is the time to plan and start a garden—a garden all your own, in which the flowers will bloom and increase year after year, and each season be lovelier than the last. Nothing else will weave the same charm and beauty into our youth as to grow up with a garden, especially if we really love the flowers and watch the things that happen there.

To succeed with a garden, you must be sincere right from the start. You must do your very best, and really help the flowers to grow. Begin right, and take a little pains, then all will go well. Mr. Luther Burbank, who, as we all know, is almost a magician among flowers, declares that all that flowers need to grow to perfectness is good soil, good air and some one to love them.

Preparing Time

MARCH is the time to prepare for a garden before weeds have taken a firm hold. And even though the nights may be a little too cold to risk setting out the tender seeds, your garden bed will be all the better for a little daily raking and hoeing that shall turn the soil over and over to be aired and sunned.

A Plant Kindergarten

IT IS a good plan to start your flowers in what gardeners call a "flat." Any one can easily make a flat by sawing a soap box in two, and boring small auger holes in the bottom for drainage. Cover the holes with an inch of moss or some pieces of broken pottery, and fill in the flat to within an inch of the top with fresh earth from the woods or fields. Pack the soil firmly, and sow the seeds in straight rows. One flat will accommodate six or seven varieties, or even more. Pansies, nasturtiums, clove gillyflowers, sweet-williams, and lady-slippers may, with all comfort, be started in one soap-box flat, and will be ready for transplanting either into the open garden or window-box in April. And never forget to put a neat wooden label at the line of each variety.

To Prepare the Garden

FLOWERS like, above all else, to grow in earth that has been carefully prepared for them. Now, the very best way to prepare the garden is to dig down about eighteen inches, throw the earth aside, take out the stones and break up the clods with your hands. Then put the earth back again, first a layer of earth, then some well rotted manure or leafy mold from the woods, and more earth, and last of all a top layer of earth with sand sifted in it. The roots of your plants will go down to find the rich food below them, and because the food is good they will become deeply rooted and will grow strong and healthy. The top layer is a very important part of your gardening; it should be frequently raked to keep it from becoming baked and hard. Young plants are like any other kind of babies, they need things made a bit comfortable and easy for them at first. Next week I shall have something further to tell you about flower gardening.

A GOOD REEL-KITE

THE kite-flying season is on again, and no all-round good fellow of a boy will admit that toy aeroplanes have routed the good old reel-kites, for they have not. Have you ever made a "keystone flier"? Here is an excellent plan for a "strong puller" that will give you a strenuous time on any breezy day. And it is so simple in construction that any boy can make one. Rig up two flat frames of half-inch pine, one 36 x 20 inches, the other 38½ x 20 inches. The taller flat frame is the back of the kite. Attach the frames at the top, and fasten them apart at the bottom by 13½ or 14 inch braces. At about eight inches below the top on the front frame fasten a cross stick, and use it for the base of a triangle, the apex of which should be firmly fastened at the center of the base of the front frame. Now brace the kite with strings or light sticks fastened diagonally across the back; these strings or sticks are important, for they help to brace the paper or muslin with which the kite is covered, against the wind.

Make the framework carefully; it will pay

The framework, once strongly put together, is ready to be covered with either stout manila paper or some bright-colored cambric or paper-muslin. Cut away the material from the triangle in the front frame, and leave the sides and bottom open. The wind pressing into the triangle presses against the back, passes out the sides and bottom while much of it is forced up into the top of the wedge and becomes the lifting power. A keystone flier is the kind of a sky-scraper every boy wants at kite-flying time.

For Our Little People

Grandma Told Me

LIFE is a stocking," Grandmother says,
"And yours is just begun;
But I am knitting the toe of mine,
And my work is almost done.

"With merry hearts we begin to knit,
And the ribbing is almost play;
Some are gay colored and some are white,
And some are ashen gray.

"But most are made of many hues,
With many a stitch set wrong;
And many a row to be ripped and re-knit
Ere the whole is fair and strong."

What the Lilies Tell

UNDER my window the lily-bells
Are swaying and swinging. Their fragranee tells
Of the day that an angel came to earth,
And the angel's tears gave the lilies birth.

For the angel had grieved, so the story is told,
And mourned within the City of Gold;
She had prayed the Father that she might go
Once more to her home in the world below.

The prayer was answered. From far-off spheres
She came, forgetting the lapse of years.
But all was changed from the home she knew,
And her sweet tears fell to the earth as dew.

Each tear that fell, so the fairies tell,
Was changed to a spotless lily-bell,
And the fragrance filling the cups of white
Was the angel's prayer as she winged her flight.

Salem Missionary Centennial

THE historic old town of Salem, Mass., was the scene of a most interesting missionary event on February 6. It was the celebration of the centennial of the going forth of the first group of American men ordained for missionary service in foreign lands. These missionaries of one hundred years ago were Adoniram Judson, Samuel Newell, Luther Rice, Samuel Nott and Gordon Hall. The settee on which they sat at the time of their ordination is still in the Tabernacle Congregational Church in Salem, and an interesting part of the recent celebration was the ordination of five young men who are to go out to the foreign field. The old church was too small to hold all who wished to attend. The young missionaries ordained at the centennial service were Rev. C. H. Maas, Rev. J. K. Lyman, Rev. J. C. Holmes, Rev. W. R. Leete and Rev. S. R. Harlow.

There were several interesting links connecting the long span of one hundred years between the two celebrations. One was the old settee already referred to and the other was an old bass viol which was played at the time of the first ordination by Dr. David D. Mussey. It was played at the centennial services by Mr. Sterling Turner. A third connecting link was an ancient table of solid mahogany which stood in front of the pulpit. On a gold plate set into the woodwork was engraved:

"Sitting around this table, the first five commissioners of the American Board appointed at Bradford, Mass., June 12, 1810, met in the parlor of the Rev. Noah Porter of Farmington, Conn. They were Gov. John Treadwell, Rev. Dr. Joseph Lyman, Rev. Calvin Chapin, Rev. Dr. Samuel Worcester and Rev. Samuel Spring."

This table was presented to the American Board by the children of Dr. Porter and was loaned to the church for the centennial celebration. At the service one hundred years ago, there was a bride present, the wife of Adoniram Judson. She was Ann Hasseltine before her marriage. So also was there the bride of one of the missionaries ordained at the centennial service. She was the young wife of the Rev. S. R. Harlow, who will go with him to West Turkey. A number of missionaries from foreign lands, who are now at home on furlough, were present and gave the right hand of fellowship to their brother missionaries who are to go forth on their errand of giving the Gospel to those in sore need of its uplifting influence.

ENJOYS "THE PILGRIM SHIP"

The Pilgrim Ship arrived safely, and I have perused its pages with ever increasing interest and profit. Its style, while simple, is yet graphic, and grips the reader with such interest that you can scarcely put it aside without reading to the end. I have not in many years read a book that was so helpful to me spiritually, and the allegory is pictured with a trenchant pen that goes to the very marrow of one's inner self. I commend it to all church members as well as outsiders.

Must the Squirrel Go?

NONE of the half-domesticated fauna in our public parks is so popular with young and old as the gray squirrel. The black and red varieties, though equally interesting to the naturalist, are more combative and less easily tamed, so that we are not so familiar with them as pets, though not so long since the former literally swarmed in the woods of our Middle West. It would seem from present indications that squirrels in the great parks of the Pacific Slope are to be destroyed in the interest of the people whom they recently delighted. We learn from the last bulletin on "Public Health Reports," that many of the squirrels in the parks and woods of San Francisco, and the country to the east, north, and south, have become infected with the deadly bubonic plague, and are being indiscriminately destroyed. The squirrels may have contracted the disease from their cousins, the rats, against whom the same war of extermination is being carried on. It has been determined that there shall be a squirrel-free zone of 6,162 acres of land in Alameda County, and to secure this poison has been freely used. In the same way 8,680 acres in San Joaquin County and 5,360 acres in Stanislaus County were covered with poison for the purpose of eradicating plague foci. For the present, at least, squirrels should not be carried between the far West and the East.

What a Child's Gift Did

A CHILD'S bequest of thirty-seven cents, made in 1895 by Ethel Shingle just before her death, found its goal recently when the handsome Methodist Episcopal Church of the Advocate, costing $105,000, was dedicated in Germantown, Pa. The little girl's gift was the beginning of a movement to raise the money necessary to construct the new edifice. By a vote of the Sunday School Board the bequest of Ethel Shingle was made the nucleus of a building fund, and the structure, when finished, was named the "Ethel Memorial." The new edifice was opened recently with special services in which the dear little maid and her consecrated gift were duly recognized by appreciative speakers.

Household Hints

Paraffin assists the small family in helping to keep a large cheese fresh until all of it has been eaten. Cut off the desired quantity, then cover the fresh cut in the cheese with melted paraffin.

Pour melted paraffin into a small mold, such as an egg-cup. Allow it to harden before turning it out, then cover with cheesecloth, leaving about an inch at the round end to hold it by. Use for ironing-wax, and it will help to keep irons clean and smooth.

For laundry purposes, the addition of two tablespoonfuls of melted paraffin, poured into a boiler full of hot soapy water, will help to free clothes from dirt, and will render them entirely sanitary. After boiling, the clothes should be thoroughly rinsed in very hot water, as hot as the hands can bear. This is important to remember, for were cold water used, the paraffin would congeal before it could be rinsed from the clothes.

The constant lifting of an iron from the ironing-board to the iron-rest is inconvenient and tiresome. If a laundress will try the following, she will be much less fatigued after a day's work: Cover about 10 x 10 inches of the broad end of the ironing-board with thick asbestos, and again, over this, tack medium mesh wire net. This makes a broad, permanent and fireproof iron-rest.

Scraped Irish potato will relieve pain caused by a burn. When mixed with water, it is excellent for cleaning the inside of bottles. Half a raw potato is frequently kept on a writing-desk, pens are stuck into it and are kept in good condition for a long time.

To prepare evaporated fruits so as to make them both attractive and digestible, cook thoroughly one-half pound apples, peaches, apricots, or prunes. Sweeten to taste. When cold, run through a meat-chopper. Add the whites of three eggs, stiffly beaten. Mix well, turn into individual molds and serve with whipped cream on top.

Lace used for dress trimmings, such as cuffs, collars, or insertions, may be made to last much longer by sewing fine net or footing underneath. If the color be matched, the effect of the lace will not be altered. Gold lace over tan net, or silver lace over gray or white net, will keep bright much longer than when allowed to come into closer contact with the skin.

A Church House for the "Down-and-Out"

FOUR years ago the Rev. E. F. Sanderson, then of Providence, R. I., but now pastor of a church in Brooklyn, conceived the idea of a Church House in Providence for the "down-and-out" men of the city, the abandoned, the discouraged, even the man with a criminal record who might still be good and make good. Indeed, the Church House was to open its doors to the criminals discharged from prisons and make a special effort to reform and re-create them. Christian aid was to be given to every man who came to the Church House, no matter what his past record was. The philanthropy emanating from the Church House was to be eminently Christian, but in no way denominational. Mr. Sanderson met with such sympathy and success that the Church House was soon established, and at the end of four years it has become a Providence institution that claims the interest and help of all denominations and all classes. The large Opera House in Providence was filled one Sunday afternoon in December when the annual meeting of the Church House was held. Protestant, Hebrew and Catholic met on a common ground of sympathy and human helpfulness. The spirit of Christian brotherhood and fellowship ran high, and the future of the Church House is assured. On the first day of last December, the board of managers acquired two large houses free from debt in the most active business section of the city, and ninety men are already in these houses and are being given a chance to make good. The expense of running the Church House last year was $3,000, but the men in the House earned $1,200 of this by their own labor. Every man who comes to the Church House must do work of some kind. No chronic idler need apply for admission, and no man is turned away without an attempt to help him. Even the lazy man is given his chance. And every man is given a chance to "get right with God." Of this, Mr. F. H. Decker, the superintendent, says:

Rev. E. F. Sanderson

"I make a most earnest and sincere effort to get each man into right relations with the world and into true faith with God."

To this end there are four religious services a week and the spiritual message is presented in the most manly and attractive way. Attendance is not compulsory, but few of the men remain away, and it is certain that many of them here decide to lead a new and better life. J. L. H.

Christ and the Paralytic*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE healing of the paralytic by Jesus Christ is one of the "dear old stories" that we never tire of reading ourselves, or of telling to our Sunday School classes, or to the children in the home. As we read about the paralytic carried on his bed by four friends to the roof of the house, we know there must have been an outside stairway, something we are quite unaccustomed to see. And when we read about the sick man being let down through the roof, we know it could not have been a two, three, or four story house, such as we generally see. We are not unaccustomed to seeing one-story houses, but they are so constructed that it would be quite impossible for any such occurrence as we are studying about to-day.

"Many were gathered together." That could not be in our small one-story houses. Strange to say, the yard was inside of the house where the throng of people had come to hear Jesus talk, and all around the yard, or court, were partly inclosed rooms which served as galleries, so that altogether there was quite an audience room. Over the court was a temporary roof. From the sound of his voice, the four men carrying the litter knew just where Jesus was standing, and it did not take them long to decide that they would make a hole in the roof, and let their sick friend down just in front of Jesus. The house was so low, it was not a hard task. Then the crowd had to make room, which they had been unwilling to do when they had been urged at the door to do so. At once the attention of Jesus was fastened upon the sick man and he discovered that he had a double malady: sin and the palsy. He saw, too, that it was necessary to cure the man of the sin before he could be cured of the palsy; and so Jesus said, "Son, thy sins are forgiven." There were men looking on who were always on the trail of Jesus as severe critics—the Scribes and Pharisees. They did not speak out that day, but they reasoned in their hearts that Jesus blasphemed when he assumed to be able to forgive sins. Jesus, to whom all hearts are opened, read their thoughts, and answered them, saying, "That ye may know that the Son of Man hath authority [power] on earth to forgive sins, I say unto thee [turning to the palsied man], Arise, and take up thy bed, and walk." And he arose, and straightway took up the bed (probably the typical thin mattress of the Oriental), and went forth before them all—a forgiven man, a healed man. Then criticism gave way to amazement on the part of the beholders, and there was no more scorning, but glorifying instead. And they confessed: "We never saw it on this fashion" (Revised Version). It is quite likely that all this happened in the home of Peter, for it was there Jesus sojourned in Capernaum.

We Are Healed by His Power

What physical wrecks we would all be if it were not for the healing power of God! For some of us he has healed broken limbs, burning fevers, and even palsy! Perhaps some of us have thoughtlessly said of a bruise or cut, "Oh, let it alone, and it will heal itself."

Wonderfully has God put his healing power within our bodies, so that no sooner do we receive an injury than the process of recovery begins. To watch the healing of a wound day by day, how it is gradually drawn together and then covered, should be a means of grace to the sufferer. That healing is a divine art should be recognized by all. And those who practice the divine art as physicians should have an added sense of the power of God and be co-laborers with God in the administration of surgery and medicine. During the lifetime of Dr. Henry W. Foster, the patients at the Clifton Springs Sanitarium all received their medicine in bottles that had the sentence "The will of the Lord be done" blown into the bottles. When patients did not improve in health, the good doctor would say: "I am afraid you are not praying to the Lord to bless the efforts we are making for you." There are many physicians who thus put their hands in God's hand, but not all. Those who do not, fail to recognize their profession as "the divine art."

How closely a Christian physician brings us to the side of the healing Christ! This is true whether he labors in a Christian land like our own, or goes forth as a medical missionary to heathen lands. It has been conclusively shown that the surest way to reach the heathen is by soothing their pains, and so hospitals are everywhere established as a part of Christian missions. We read (in Luke 9: 1) that when Jesus sent out his twelve disciples he gave them power and authority over all devils, and to cure diseases. If we will read the annals of medical missions we shall become convinced that Jesus is still the healing Christ. That he heals to-day in answer to prayer is shown by the incident told of Joseph Benson, one of the first Wesleyan preachers, who had a daughter so afflicted that she was not able to walk, and had to be carried up and down stairs. One morning when there was a special prayer service in the home she was carried by her husband from her room into the parlor, when her venerable father and a few others were present. All knelt in prayer save the afflicted one, who remained sitting with her helpless foot resting upon a cushion. Somehow the father's heart was unusually drawn out for his poor invalid daughter, and he ventured with a strange confidence to ask God for her immediate healing. As he prayed thus, a new sensation thrilled through that diseased limb and foot, and she who had not walked for years was suddenly seized with the conviction that she could certainly walk now. She would at once have attempted it, but for fear of disturbing the company. But as soon as the prayer was ended, she arose directly from her chair, and deliberately walked across the room to where her husband was sitting. Then, passing from one to another, she joyfully saluted the whole company, asserting her sudden and glad recovery. Afterward she went up stairs without assistance, and was thenceforth as well as in earlier years. Doubtless CHRISTIAN HERALD readers could add from their own observation or experience many such incidents.

Sin Worse Than Disease

"Which makes you the most happy, to be cured of the palsy or to have your sins forgiven?" Possibly some one asked that question of the man we are studying about. Let us imagine if we can what he said; probably something like this: "It is blessed to go about on my feet as other folks do, and not have to be carried everywhere. It is glorious not to be obliged to lie on a bed of pain all day and all night. But the joy in my soul because of forgiven sin is the sweetest experience of all. If I were back in my old estate, and had to choose between being cured of the palsy or having my sin forgiven, I would say, 'Forgive my sin; for I am sure the palsy will not be so hard to bear when I have been made right with God.'" Jesus knew that sin was more deadly than palsy, and so he forgave the sin before he cured the palsy.

Sunday School Lesson

as you watch against the beginning of disease. Malignant, and sometimes deadly, illness often starts in some almost unnoticed way. A damning sin may commence in one overt act.

"I can't find out what is the matter with my watch," said a boy to his schoolmate. "Dropped it?" "No, I am too careful for that." "Worn out?" "No, I have only had it two years." "Well, go to Scratchley, the watchmaker, and let him look at it." Together the boys went into the shop. Now Scratchley had only one eye, but he saw more with that one than most people do with two. Taking up a powerful glass, he put it between that wonderful eye of his and the works of the watch, and then uttered an exclamation. "What's the matter?" both boys exclaimed. He answered, "A grain of sand has got into one of these delicate bits of machinery, and is causing the watch to lose time continually." "Only that?" said the owner of the watch. "Aye, 'tis only that. You think because a grain of sand is a small thing, and takes up but little room, that it can not injure the watch. But just because it is small it does the greatest harm, for few would suspect that it lay hidden there." The old man began work on the watch, and at the same time a sermon to the two boys. "So it is with most of us, young gentlemen. There's many a little grain of sin that interferes with the machinery of heart and life: wrong, cross words, angry looks, a sneaking tale, or dirty trick, blocks our hearts, and is the little grain that hinders the wheels and spoils the works. There's the enemy Satan, always watching to thrust the grain of sand into the souls that ought to be God's timepieces. Boys, you and me's got to look to the Lord to keep us running right, and never say 'only that' to a sin, however small it may look. He's able to keep us, you know, and if you don't know, the sooner you try his keeping power the better." So saying, with a sharp click he shut the watch, and, laying the extracted grain of sand on the point of a sharp penknife, held it out for the boys to look at.

Sometimes the beginnings of sin are so small that we are in danger of not recognizing them as influences that will lead us astray. In a recent mine disaster where thirty-five bodies had been taken out, the rescuers were told that others were missing, and they started in again with canary birds in small cages. And why canaries? Because those beautiful little birds are most sensitive to any atmosphere that will not support life, and so were carried into the mines by the helmeted rescuers for the purpose of detecting the first sign of poisonous gases. As soon as the canaries showed symptoms of dizziness, volunteer rescuers were dismissed, and only the helmeted rescuers went forward. In this way five lives were saved after the thirty-five bodies had been taken out. Let us seek to keep in our hearts sensibility to sin, and pray God for a power to feel when there is danger of temptation.

Teaching the Lesson to Children

A picture of a house such as is described in this lesson will greatly help the attention and understanding of the children. It can be made simply by drawing two squares on the blackboard, of two different sizes, the smaller square in the larger one; the second representing the wall of the house, and the first the yard or court. The space between the two squares might well be marked off for rooms. In the center of the court write the name of Jesus to show where he stood; represent the crowd of people by many dots; draw a line in front of Jesus to represent the man who was let down through the roof to be healed by Jesus. The Bible picture roll will be invaluable as the story progresses. Not all the illustrations given in this lesson are suited to children, but the one about the grain of sand in the watch will be particularly so.

This is addressed to the average man

Average ambition, average strength, average determination, average willingness to work, average intelligence and a little money will bring certain and big returns if invested in the marvelous

San Joaquin
Valley, California

Greater wealth is coming from California's farms than from her mines and the San Joaquin Valley is the center of production.

About 40,000 developed farms are being cultivated. There is room for 100,000 more.

Your alfalfa should net $40 an acre. Your fruit much more.

The soil, the climate, the water for irrigation is there, all that is needed is men—honest, ambitious men and women, who will work and reap the reward of their labor.

Go NOW—You can buy a farm cheap and on terms that will allow the land to pay for itself. On your deferred payments the interest charge will be only six per cent, or less.

Your dairy cows should bring you $90 a year—your hens $1 each.

Go this Spring, buy forty or eighty acres, even ten or twenty will give you a good living and a surplus, put most of your place to alfalfa—get a few good dairy cows from the man who owns the creamery (he will sell them to you on time) and from the start there will be an income. After the first year the profits from the place will meet all payments—in four or at most five years you will be out of debt and the sole proprietor of a home that can be sold for $250 or more per acre and will bring you a net income of at least $40 an acre.

If you are above the average your profits will be above, too.

Can you do as well where you are?

If you can you are unusual and your California profits will likewise be above the average.

Can you do as well where you are?

I am trying to give you an idea of what you, an average man, reasonably may expect to do in this wonderful valley. I say that you should earn a net income of at least $40 an acre from the soil. I know hundreds of men who would think that their land was sick if it netted them only $40 an acre above all expenses.

You owe it to yourself, to your wife and to your children to investigate what the San Joaquin Valley offers you. It will cost just two cents—for a stamp to mail the coupon to me.

I will send you the new San Joaquin Valley book—it tells the story of other men's experience.

If you wish I will tell you just what it will cost you to go and see for yourself. That will convince you.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Rebellion Against Love*

WHEN a young man was reproved for ingratitude to a friend who had done much for him, he said roughly, "I didn't ask him to do it, did I? He did it of his own accord. I wish he hadn't done it, if I have got to kowtow to him for it as long as I live."

The two or three who heard these brutal words were shocked and sickened at the hard heart and the utter lack of delicacy which they revealed. There is scarcely any human failing which produces such a feeling of disgust and contempt in a right-minded beholder as ingratitude.

There is an old story of a great artist, who was not a Christian. One day he saw a pretty gipsy girl, untaught, and living the usual wild and roving life of her race, and asked her to be his model. As he offered her a good price, she was glad to sit for him. Just opposite her, as he painted, was an unfinished picture of the crucifixion. She gazed upon it with interest. At last she asked him, "Master, who is that?"

"That is Jesus Christ."

"Was he such a bad man that they nailed him to that cruel cross?"

"Oh, no, he was very good."

"Tell me some more about him," she begged.

The artist did not like to do this, but he could not refuse her, and told her the little that he knew of the Saviour. She asked for still more, and he had to read the Gospels to satisfy her. Her last sitting came. She was about to bid the painter good-by, when she stooped over him and whispered, "You say that you do not love that good man who died for you and all of us. How can you help it! I love him, and you ought to love him. I would die for him."

The painter was deeply affected. After she had left him, he fell on his knees, struck to the heart by a sense of his own blind ingratitude. Taking the half-finished picture, he erased what he had painted. He saw that it had been the work of a merely artistic appreciation. He began again, with a soul on fire with love and thankfulness. The result was one of the world's great pictures, which now hangs in a famous European gallery. The little gipsy girl never knew what she was giving to the world when she spoke that brave word to the painter.

Even good Christians among us are seldom willing to make the sacrifices for their religion which our missionaries report as almost universal among the newly converted heathen. Thus Dr. George Heber Jones reports that the Korean men often sell their best rice, and live on poorer, in order to give the difference to the church; while Korean women sometimes give their wedding rings and cut off their hair and sell it, in order to promote the spread of the Gospel.

What Is Success?†

ABLUNDER has been often committed, no doubt unintentionally, by certain pretty good people in writing and talking of rich men as though they were the only successful ones in the community. The busy writers who have been probing the scandals in our politics, and in what is called "big business," declare that at the bottom of most of them are men of wealth who often occupy honorable stations in the community. They are sometimes public-spirited and bestow useful gifts upon their fellow citizens, and yet these same "good" men do not hesitate to bribe legislatures, to crush out competitors by cruel and unjust methods, and to build up a secret network of corruption and malfeasance, in order to protect and extend their financial interests. Mr. Edward A. Ross, in his recent works, has exposed and denounced many of these ingenious and original designs. The "plain people" are honest. The wickedness among us is chiefly confined to what some one has called "the scum and dregs" of society.

Our Saviour well understood and explained the perils of wealth. "How hardly shall he that hath riches enter into the kingdom of God!" To secure a working capital which shall keep his family from becoming a burden upon the community, should be the effort of every self-respecting citizen; but after a fair support is ensured for them, he should devote himself primarily, as he should have done always, more or less, to higher ends—the extension of a pure religion; the purification of politics; the relief of suffering; and to the extinction of vice, such as gambling, intemperance, and the sins which follow in their train.

Two of the most revered justices of our Supreme Court—men of high wisdom and stainless integrity—have recently died, leaving their families poor. Congress will pass special bills to provide for them. These men have been obliged to reside in an expensive city, and though they have usually lived far more plainly than most of those with whom they have associated, it has been impossible for them to save large amounts, or to carry heavy life-insurance. In fact, most of our army and navy officers, and many of our senators and congressmen, die poor. Some one has said that most men who enter the service of the public can hope to make their families comfortable only during their lifetime. Unless they die poor, it is feared that there is something wrong with them.

To live in the fear of the Lord; working hard at one's daily task; aiming for the elevation of the world; trying to make all better and happier with whom we come in contact; keeping a brave heart through everything—this is success. Every honest, faithful Christian can achieve it.

A WOMAN DOCTOR

Was Quick to See that Coffee Poison was Doing the Mischief.

A lady tells of a bad case of coffee poisoning and tells it in a way so simple and straightforward that literary skill could not improve it.

"I had neuralgic headaches for 12 years," she says, "and have suffered untold agony. When I first began to have them I weighed 140 pounds, but they brought me down to 110.

"I went to many doctors and they gave me only temporary relief. So I suffered on, till one day, a woman doctor advised me to drink Postum. She said I looked like I was coffee poisoned.

"So I began to drink Postum, and gained 15 pounds in the first few weeks and am still gaining, but not so fast as at first. My headaches began to leave me after I had used Postum about two weeks—long enough, I expect, to get the coffee poison out of my system.

"Now that a few months have passed since I began to use Postum, I can gladly say that I never know what a neuralgic headache is like any more, and it was nothing but Postum that relieved me.

"Before I used Postum I never went out alone; I would get bewildered and would not know which way to turn. Now I go alone and my head is as clear as a bell. My brain and nerves are stronger than they have been for years." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"There 's a reason," and it is explained in the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

The greatest musical center in the whole world

GREATER than the Metropolitan Opera House; greater than Covent Garden, where the royalty of England is entertained; greater than La Scala at Milan, the Grand Opera House of Paris, and the Royal Opera of Berlin; greater in fact than all the opera houses and places of entertainment in the world, is the seventh floor of Building No. 5—the center of a city in itself formed by the modern structures of steel and concrete that house the giant industry of the Victor and Victor-Victrola.

To this building in the city of Camden, just across the historic Delaware River from the city of Philadelphia, comes a never-ending procession of the very greatest artists in the whole world. Today it may be Caruso or Amato, and tomorrow it may be Melba, or Tetrazzini, or Schumann-Heink, or Farrar; or it may be several of them assembling to unite in making a masterpiece like the "Sextette from Lucia." Or it may be Paderewski, or Kubelik, or Elman, or Harry Lauder, or Blanche Ring; and then again it might be Sousa and his band, or Victor Herbert and his orchestra.

But whoever it is or whatever the organization, rest assured that within the four walls of this building is heard, day in and day out, year in and year out, music in all its forms such as no other place on earth has ever heard.

And unlike music that is heard in any other place, which is only a momentary pleasure ending with its rendition, Victor music lives forever. From its beginning in Building No. 5, it goes through the various processes necessary to its perpetuation and eventually leaves the shipping department (Buildings Nos. 9 and 10) to be heard again and again in hundreds of thousands of homes, just as it is heard in the sacred precincts of the recording room on the seventh floor of Building No. 5.

Fur-Clad Eskimos of Victoria Land on Their First Visit to a White Man's Camp

A NEW RACE VISITED BY WHITE MEN

A NEW race of people of the North, who have never before seen a white man, are now introduced for the first time to the civilization of the temperate zone by the American Museum of Natural History in New York City. These records of tribes never before classified, and of races hitherto unknown to ethnology, come from the Arctic expedition of the Museum, which since 1908 has been exploring the barren lands and the distant icebound straits. For the first time in their lives the new people have faced the camera, and it may be for the last, as far as these individuals are concerned who are seen through negatives developed on board the schooner Teddy Bear, far North in the regions where stretch endless wastes of snow and ice.

The expedition is in charge of Dr. R. M. Anderson and Mr. V. Stefansson, both experienced explorers, who have studied the habits of strange tribes and peoples in high latitudes. The tribes which they have visited are in the Copper Mine River territory and the neighboring islands of British North America. As they pushed still farther toward the pole, to their surprise they came in contact with the most mysterious race of all Eskimos, with blond hair, long beards and strange facial variations, reputed descendants of survivors of the lost expedition of Sir John Franklin. The sheaves of letters accompanying the photographs that have been sent home tell of a simple people of strange manners and customs which start the ethnologist thinking on the origin of these strange tribes.

Explorer Stefansson Traveling with Dog Sledge in Victoria Land

They proved to be the Akuliakattagmiuts, or so they call themselves. Neither they nor any of their forefathers, as far as they knew, had ever seen a white man, an Indian, or an Eskimo from the West. They believed by tradition, however, that the Indians were bad; that the Eskimos of the West were none too estimable, and that the white men, the Kablunat, as they called them, were good. Owing to their lack of contact with civilization, these Eskimos of the interminable name are a primitive race. The explorers declare that all the best qualities of the so-called civilized Eskimos are found more fully among these uncivilized brethren. The Akuliakattagmiuts make rather better camps than most of the Eskimos, and have tents of skins which they raise over the foundations made of blocks of snow and ice. They are all expert fishermen and hunters. They make, after their own designs, which very closely resemble those of other Eskimos, all sorts of weapons and tackle for the chase.

The Eskimos of this region are very hospitable, and as long as any one has anything to eat his neighbors are welcome to it while it lasts. Sometimes this arrangement proved very embarrassing to the Arctic tourists on science bent. The explorers killed seal and caribou for themselves, and when visitors came they were amazed to find the food gone as in the twinkling of an eye. Seal blubber and a blood soup, served in flagons made from caribou horns, are accounted luxuries by this people.

They had never seen a sulphur match, nor had they ever heard the discharge of firearms. When the explorers fired a rifle, the chief men of the village made signs that such a thing could not be permitted on their hunting grounds, and that if it continued there would be trouble. Investigations made by the scientists have led them to the belief that these Eskimos of Victoria Land are possibly the original strain, and that those of the West have spread out from them, and have lost in culture and in general character as well as in personal appearance.

The explorers were especially impressed with the race known as the Haneragmiut, found in Victoria Land, north of Cape Bexley. There were only forty of them, of whom seventeen had light hair. An Alaskan Eskimo who had worked on whaling vessels said of them: "They no Eskimo, they fo'c'sle men." Two of them had full chin beards, which were light, shading to red, and every one had light eyebrows. One of them, the darkest of all, had curly hair.

In the forties of the last century, Franklin's expedition, with its full complement of men, was lost somewhere near Victoria Land. Some of its men are accounted for by journal entries of officers, who themselves perished later, and others by graves and unburied skeletons along the route toward the Black River. These men must have known that there was a boat route to the Hudson Bay Company posts on the Mackenzie River, for Franklin's own three expeditions had discovered and mapped it by boat voyage. Even though some may have perished on that awful journey, others may have found their way to the Eskimos of Victoria Land, and have had sufficient adaptability to learn Eskimo methods of self-support. One of the evidences of this is a name, Nerk, which is believed to be a thin disguise for the English "Ned," and is about as near as the swarthy brother in skins can pronounce the civilized cognomen.

The explorers are shipping great quantities of material to the Museum, showing the customs of these people, and are making many notes and studies which will aid in solving the identity of these denizens of the far North. LILLIAN E. ZEH.

An Easter Sermon by Rev. J. H. Jowett, D.D.

The Gift of Eternal Life

TEXT: "The free gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord." Rom. 6: 23 (R.V.)

THE free gift of God is eternal life." And what is this eternal life? When one man has it, and another man has it not, do they just belong to different standards, but in the same school? Is human life all of a piece, of the same fundamental essence, and varying only in quality and degree? Is eternal life only common life refined, or is it a new creation? Is eternal life just life in the higher grades, and can we be schooled and cultured into it? That is certainly the basis and trend of many men's reasoning. Life to them, in all its human range, would be imaged in a column of Aberdeen granite which stands in the museum of the University of Edinburgh. The column is of one unbroken piece, but it is arranged in ascending sections to represent the different processes and stages through which the granite passes from the quarry to the polished shaft. The pedestal is rough, jagged, and primitive, just as it left the quarry, bearing all the marks of the blasting. And then follow layer upon layer, each succeeding one being subjected to a more rigid discipline than its predecessor, until every uncouthness is left behind, and all its wealthy and exquisite veins are discovered in the refined and shining product. And that, I say, is how many people reason about eternal life. Eternal life is just common life perfected. Common life is the rough-hewn block; eternal life is the same block, chastened and refined. The two do not represent a change of substance; they represent differences effected by labor and culture. And so eternal life is just an accomplishment; it belongs to a different standard, but not to a different order.

The New Birth

Now, let it be said at once that this is not the teaching of Jesus. As soon as we turn to the teaching of our Lord we discover that one emphasis stands out with almost startling intensity. According to our Lord, eternal life is not a refinement, but a renaissance; not the product of discipline, but the issue of birth. It is not an upper standard, but a regenerated order. Nowhere can you find a suggestion of a gradient leading by perceptible stages from the human to the divine. There is no sloping stair, whose topmost step brings us to "the shining table-land, to which our God himself is moon and sun." The man who has eternal life and the man who has it not occupy two different planes; and the passage from one to the other is not by a process of gradual consummation, but of immediate recreation. We do not climb into eternal life; we are born into it. That is the teaching of our Lord. "Except a man be born from above, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

Eternal life, then, is not something attained, it is something imparted; it is not the last result of pruning, it is the reception of a new seed. I do not know any thinker of my acquaintance who has put this matter more clearly and boldly than Dr. Dale, and I quote him all the more readily because the firm, steady steps of his reasoning were so undisturbed by the enervating air of sentimentalism. "When a man is regenerated," he says, "he receives a new life, and receives it from God. In itself regeneration is not a change in his old life, but the beginning of a new life, which is conferred by the immediate and supernatural act of the Holy Spirit." The man is really "born again." A higher nature has come to him than that which he inherited from his human parents: "he is begotten of God"; "born of the Spirit." That clear and definite teaching I commend to you as the very word and mind of God. We do not enter into eternal life through a process, but in a crisis; we enter it by recreation.

"This Is Life Eternal"

Now, I am not disposed to try to compress the secret of eternal life within the shrine of a definition. The power of definition soon wanes; there are atmospheres in which it speedily grows faint. But the indefinable is not the unreal; we are surrounded by a million facts which cannot be lured into the snares of definition. Who can define thought? I rose from my desk and took down the very last and ablest of our dictionaries, that I might see how far the learned editor had succeeded in expressing the secret of thought. And here it is: "Thought, a series of phenomena in consciousness!" Is the secret there? Has the definition trapped it? Or is the ethereal thing escaped and away? I said to myself, I will see what this learned definer has to say about love! So I took down the fourth volume to see what he had got in his net; and here it is: "Love, a feeling of predilection or solicitude for certain individuals, classes, principles, qualities, or things." Has he got it? Will any lover be willing to admit that the fair and sunny genius has been caught and her ultimate secret disclosed? No; definition speedily fails, but the reality abides. We must not dismiss what we cannot define, or we shall have to empty both the heart and its world.

And so it is with eternal life; it is the mysterious issue of a mysterious birth, and its essential secret cannot be defined. Nicodemus saith unto Him, "How can a man be born again?" "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof"—there can be no doubt about its reality—"but thou canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth"—it is reality enshrouded with mystery—"so is every one that is born of the Spirit." But, even though these things cannot be defined, it may be that they can be characterized. How, then, can we characterize this eternal life, up to which we can never climb, but into which we may be born? Well, it is life that is characterized by knowledge of God. "This is life eternal, to know Thee, and Jesus Christ!" Wherever there is eternal life there is some apprehension of God, some "awareness" of his all-encompassing presence. When our Saviour says: "This is life eternal, to know thee," I do not think the primary content of the word is mental illumination, although that will most assuredly be in the shining train; but it fundamentally refers to the intelligence of sympathy, the correspondence of kinship, if you will, the telepathic communion of spirits attuned to the same key.

The Free Gift of God

Shall I illustrate it in this way? There was one who said to me a little while ago, concerning a loved one who had been brought back to him after a long and troubled absence: "Even when I am at my desk, and immersed in my labor, there's a singing consciousness at the back of it all that she is in the home again!" May I take that word to help in the exposition of my text? That singing apprehension of a presence, in absorbing labors and in relaxing hours, is symbolic of the apprehension which is theirs who know the Lord. "This is life eternal, to know thee," to appreciate thee, to have a singing consciousness that everywhere, in spheres of labor and rest, the Lord is in the house! "Because he is at my right hand!" That is the apprehension of God. "When I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no ill, for thou art with me!" That is the apprehension of God. "Nothing shall separate us from the love of God." That is the apprehension of God; the singing basal consciousness that the Lover is in the house! It is "deep calling unto deep"; it is the sympathetic vibration of those who partake of the same nature, and that nature is divine. Of course, as I have said, this blessed appreciation will be the minister of light; the inspiration of the heart will help the illumination of the mind; sympathy will befriend reason; the "life" will become the "light" of men.

How is this "eternal life" obtained? It is "the free gift of God." Will you mark an earlier clause in this verse, a clause with which I am not now directly concerned? I will only quote it in order to throw our immediate text into startling contrast. "The wages of sin is death!" "But the free gift of God is eternal life"; that can never be earned! "Free gift," that is the largess, the unearned bounty, scattered by the Emperor on high and festive days. "Eternal life" is a largess, not a payment; not "wages," but a "free gift." It is not an attainment, but a boon; not a fortune won, but a fortune inherited. It is a legacy made to paupers; the Lord our Saviour is the legator, and you and I are the legatees. And in this we are all alike. "Life's poor distinctions vanish here." We may bring our wealth, but our wealth cannot bribe the porter at the gate. We must come empty-handed. "Nothing in my hands I bring!" "Blessed are the poor!" We may bring our learning, but learning does not possess the "open sesame" into the land of life and light. "God hath chosen the foolish!" Not in the pride of knowledge must we come, and with brusque and presumptuous step; rather must we come as "pilgrims of the night," waiting humbly and reverently for the opening of the fountains of the day. "Blessed are the poor!" "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." Eternal life is a "free gift"; it is given to meritless paupers, whose conscious poverty is their profoundest plea.

Where, then, can we get the legacy? Here is the answer: "The free gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord." That is where we are to seek and find the inheritance—"in Jesus Christ our Lord." And this is the reasoning of the Sacred Word: "that eternal life is in the Son." The life that was in Jesus was of the eternal order, and of that sort of life the risen Lord is the reservoir and fountain. Get the music of these three great passages as I proclaim them from the Book: "In him was life"; "I am the life"; "he that hath the Son hath life!" So you see what we have got to do in order to get our legacy is to get the legator himself. "He that hath the Son hath life." The "free gift" is "in Christ Jesus our Lord." We need trouble about nothing else except to become one with the Lord. "Having him we possess all things." Become one with him, and his life becomes ours.

Belief and Obedience the Way

How, then, may we become one with the Lord of Life? The Lord himself proclaims two ways: belief and obedience. By these two ministers our Lord and we become one. First, by belief! And what is belief? It is not the suppression of reason. Belief is the exaltation of the noblest hypotheses to the throne of the life. To believe in Christ is to take the sublimest assumptions, and make them the principles of our soul. To believe in Christ is to take the highest we know and allow it to govern all that we do. To believe in Christ is to venture your life on the assumptions of Christ. Do you know anything higher, nobler, more glorious, than the assumptions of Christ? To believe is to accept them, to venture on them, and to venture in the assurance that the highest is always the truest and best. He claims to be able to convert destructive remorse into a constructive penitence. He claims to be able to take the virus out of a poisoning guilt. He claims to be able to put dynamics into feeble and struggling virtue. He claims to be able to weld the complexities of life into unity, and to convert its discords into harmony. He claims to be able to take the alienated and embattled individuals of the race, and out of the scattered and hostile fragments to create a brotherhood. This is what our Saviour claims to do. To believe is to let him do it, and to offer one's life for the sacred experiment! Belief is to take the highest at his highest word, to assent to the desirability of his ideals, and to consent to his will. And so belief involves obedience. In these high regions no one can become free without first becoming a slave. But the servitude is not irksome; it is sweetened and glorified by its issue. We must die to self if we would live unto God! We are seeking kinship with the Divine, and we must surrender ourselves to its blessed ministry.

> I lived for myself, I thought for myself,
> For myself, and none beside;
> Just as if Jesus had never lived,
> As if he had never died.

That center must be changed, inevitably changed, and it is inevitably changed under the twofold ministry of belief and obedience. And when those two conditions are established we become one with the eternal God, we become "partakers of the divine nature," we receive "the free gift" of "eternal life," and we are "alive unto God." "The free gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord." May it be the blessed, the infinite privilege of everybody here to pass out of poverty into that unspeakable and inexhaustible wealth!

AN EASTER SONG

HAIL, Easter morning! Hail, glorious day!
The angelic chorus sings victory to-day!
Christ the Lord is risen, the stone is rolled away.
Glory in the highest! Christ is risen to-day.

Fear not, weep not, by an empty tomb,
For our Lord is risen to scatter grief and gloom.
Go, thou, and meet Him in Galilee;
Quickly spread the joyful news, and his disciple be.

Glorious resurrection! Christ our Lord adore.
Sing, oh, sing his victory! Praise him evermore.
Crown him King of victors, for he set us free—
Paid a price that we may be with him eternally.

The Resurrection Life

THE Lord Jesus "came and touched the bier; and he that was dead sat up, and began to speak" (Luke 7: 14, 15). This is not told as a parable. It is divine truth; apparently an interlude in the life of Jesus; a natural manifestation of his unbounded sympathy for the poor and fallen, which at all times was spontaneously outflowing from his loving heart as a gushing spring from the side of a mountain.

The event is beautifully significant of the mission of Christ to our world. He came to awaken man from the slumber of death; from the apathetic condition that sin has laid upon all mankind.

In this solemn scene, death is changed into resurrection life. The heart of a weeping mother is transformed into ecstasy of joy; and in time, all heaven will rejoice with the Father, when the redeemed from among the dead will stand in his presence, a victory of life over death.

Every individual, whose last resting place is the grave, must pass through the ordeal of death and resurrection. These are inherent conditions; the inevitable consequence of the first disobedience in the Garden of Eden. It cannot be annulled: it has "passed upon all men, for all have sinned."*

"They that are in the flesh cannot please God." †

Death comprehends the eternal destruction of soul and body; but the Son of God came into the world to destroy its power by transferring its terror and sting upon his own immaculate person.

"I am the resurrection and the life" is the Gospel trump appealing to every mortal who is yet spared to hear its sound; and the One who gave life to the widow's son proclaims in language that all heaven confirms: "He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." ‡

Death cannot bind the one who believes in Christ. It cannot jeopardize life with the Son of God throughout the never-ending eternity. The heart that accepts the Lord Jesus unto righteousness, confessing fidelity by accepting the offered salvation through the blood, stands upon the solid rock foundation—the cornerstone laid by the Master's hand, the Father of Eternal Love.

The pathetic scene enacted near the gate of the city called Nain is an object lesson to warm the heart of every one having within himself the evidence of regeneration glowing in the soul.

The believer whose body is moldering in mother earth will spring into effulgent brightness, glorified and clothed with holy light as with a garment, § when the Father shall say to our dear Redeemer, "Go forth and gather in thy jewels." ‖

Castles in the Air

LET them that would build castles in the air,
Vault thither without step or stair:
Instead of feet to climb, take wings to fly,
And think their turrets top the sky.
But let me lay all my foundations deep,
And learn, before I run, to creep.
Who digs through rocks to lay his groundwork low,
May in good time build high and sure, though slow.

The Unlimited Life

By Eugene Thwing

SOME philosopher of the restricted life exclaimed, "Blessed is the man who realizes his limitations!" and the words have been accepted as a wise caution and restraint to curb the forward impulse and to cool the ardor of ambitious men. It is our privilege in this progressive day, when manhood refuses to be held down or confined within narrow fences, to cast aside all such obstructive counsel and fling this banner to the breeze: Blessed is the man who conquers his limitations and reaches out after his possibilities.

Life is broad and rich and its doors are not locked or barred. Sometimes they stick, and the young man or young woman who would pass from a small room to a larger one must push with all the power at command to get the door open, but it can be opened, and beyond it still another and another will yield to determined assault.

We must not ask that every hinge shall be oiled, and every entrance into the larger life be made easy. The struggle is necessary to the strength as truly as the strength is necessary to the struggle. No puny soul can live the unlimited life.

MANY a man has gone through the early years of his manhood without really finding himself; too many by far never make the important discovery. A dull, grinding subjection to the restrictions and dwarfing influences of life has reduced the power of assertion, has stifled the spirit of enthusiasm, and has made a cringing creature of one who was intended to dominate and to rule.

The man who is always recognizing his limitations has little time or courage for realizing and reaching out after his broader possibilities. The young chicken which should regard the shell of the egg as the fixed and permanent boundary of its life, to be recognized and accepted without a fight, would die a-borning no more truly than the man who fails to break through surrounding restrictions to attain his larger life.

The man who does everything in the customary way, and pronounces a thing "impossible" if it cannot be done by ordinary methods, loses his originality and power of initiative. He who tries to dodge and escape difficulties as long as possible does not develop the power to surmount them when he can no longer dodge them. Such a man is living within the shell of his egg instead of breaking through it, and soon the strength to force his prison is gone.

HAPPY is the man who finds and asserts his dominant ego before he becomes hopelessly and finally submerged. I have known such men. They have gone along for years the slaves of circumstances, held down unresistingly, though not always uncomplainingly, by hard masters or hard conditions, moving in a dull, narrow routine of life, seemingly unconscious that they belong by right, and can be, in a very different relationship to life. Suddenly something has awakened within them; they have been born again; they have discovered the wonderful fact, as old as creation, that the Almighty did not put man on this earth to be a weakling or a slave, but to be a strong ruler and to have dominion; likewise that he equipped him with powers and provided possibilities of development in keeping with the bigness of his position, and put upon him responsibilities of similar measure.

The awakening of such a man is a beautiful thing—an inspiration to all who see it. He knows at last that he is heir to a vast kingdom; that he was made a little lower than the angels and crowned with glory and honor; that he was appointed to have dominion over the works of the great Creator, and that all things have been put under his feet. He stands erect and lifts his head to the sun. There is firmness and confidence in his tread, his eyes are steady and deep, and his voice rings with the sure note of truth and command.

BOLDNESS, resourcefulness, unconquerableness, cleanness, self-control, gentleness, unselfishness are seven of his kingly qualities, and service to others is the crown and glory of his larger life. His horizon broadens constantly as his life expands. He goes from strength to strength. Laughter and singing are in his mouth from the very joy of living and seeing the exuberance and blessing of his life brimming over into the lives of others on every side. The desert places of human barrenness and need are his field of work and he makes them to blossom like the rose with his deeds of sympathy and service. Other royal souls in the humble walks of life and in the exalted places of the earth everywhere are his yokefellows, and nowhere does he lack for the password, for it is the one universal password of all people and all ages—Love.

He learns that broad as his life may grow to be, here in its interest and its human contact, it is only a vestibule, an antechamber, through whose farther door he is to pass into the unlimited life beyond. He discovers through the very joy itself which he feels in service that it must be only a beginning of an unlimited service for which he is preparing. As he measures the life behind him, he asks not "What have I gained?" but "What have I given?" and as he goes on toward the unlimited life before him, he tells himself with gladness and expectation, not that "Here I am weary; there I shall rest." He does not sing, "Labor ended." He exults in the knowledge that "Here I have tried to be faithful in a few things; there I shall be ruler over many things. Here, the most I can do is so little; there I can do so much. Here I am in the kindergarten of service; there I shall graduate into an eternity of joyful activity in my Father's business."

THE NEW NAME

I KNOW not what the name will be
Which Christ my Lord will give to me,
When at my journey's end I stand
Within the gates of Beulah Land.

That name so sweet in heavenly tone
My Lord will give to me alone.
That name will suit my saved soul—
My ransomed name—while ages roll.

That name will mean, in Heaven's speech,
The greatest love my soul could reach;
And deepest sin, rebellious ways,
From these redeemed, I'll sing His praise.

That name will mean that service new
Which Christ will give to me to do.
No other soul my Lord will ask
To do my soul's peculiar task.

When that blest name my Lord shall speak,
With love and joy his face I'll seek.
Redeemed from earthly sin and shame,
I'll answer to my heavenly name.

The Good Shepherd

See illustration on cover page

WE MUST needs have hunted far and wide in the world of art for a picture more fitting or more beautiful to reproduce than is our present cover subject, "The Good Shepherd."

By an extremely accurate and sensitive color process we have been able to reproduce the painting almost exact in every detail of light and shade, as it appears in the splendid canvas which won for the artist, Mr. Joseph Farquharson, A.R.A., highest honors at the latest exhibition of the Royal Academy in London. The picture with its poetic message, old as the hills and fresh as the morning, is more than a painting: it is a poem, a sermon, an inspiration. With the confidence of a soul led of God, David uses the same theme in the matchless Shepherd's Psalm, and with it St. John in the 12th chapter of his Revelation pictures heaven itself.

"The Lamb that is in the midst of them shall be their shepherd, and shall guide them unto fountains of waters of life." No lonely nor lost sheep are these: beautiful and fearless they trail the dangerous hillside; black storm-clouds have gathered; the night is very near, and suddenly a piercing light breaks through the leaden sky: a light so startling in its effect as to transfigure the simple shepherd into a blessed vision expressive of the comfort that God gives to souls that heed his voice. The flock only pauses and looks up, full of the leisurely confidence of well-tended sheep. Yonder behind them on the height is their shepherd; why question? He is always with them, and his presence means "All is well." The message of the picture is clear to read.

CHINA BREAKING HER IDOLS

400 "Joss Gods" Decapitated by the Triumphant Revolutionists in Canton

A Colossal Figure of Buddha

The Heads of Two Famous Joss Gods in the Fuchoo Temple, Ningpo

A Typical Buddhist Statue

BY WILLIAM DURBAN

THE peculiar edifice known as the Canton "Temple of Horrors" has been the scene of a strange transaction, the possibility of which could never have been conceived by any mind at all familiar with the old ways of the Chinese. That building is a central shrine of one of the most distorted Buddhist cults, utterly unlike the original creed of Gautama Buddha. It is a picture gallery of the most hideous and horrifying orgies of cruelty in an imaginary hell. Pictures and graffiti of infernal tortures are very numerous in certain Chinese Buddhist sanctuaries. The Canton Temple of Horrors is supposed to be a real replica of the subterranean purgatory. It is known as the "Hsing Wong Miao."

The revolutionaries in the middle of December chose this head center of terror above all other places for a startling demonstration of their new-born attitude toward this degrading and grotesque system of scaring the souls of the people. The Hsing Wong Miao is a deeply revered cathedral of Chinese paganism, for it is a veritable pantheon. For many years it has been the depository of the images of four hundred infernal deities. Few indeed of the Chinese gods have a celestial location or relationship. The famous joss named Tsao, the "Kitchen God" (who is, after watching over the culinary department for a year, sent up to heaven in a little chariot of fire made of bamboo and ignited before the front door), is supposed to give an account to the King of Heaven of all that has been transacted in that part of the dwelling that year. So his lips are sometimes smeared with honey or sugar-water, in order that he may be coaxed to give a good report in the upper world. But the average Chinaman and his family think chiefly with solicitude of the grim under world. Fear of the future is the spiritual keynote of the national thought.

In the ranks of the reformers and the revolutionists is a much larger element of active and intelligent Christian converts than the outside world imagines. There have been two converging influences at work during the two past decades, the result of which is only now becoming conspicuously manifest. These are, in the first place, the propaganda of missions, with which the whole country has been quietly dotted. There are rather more than three thousand Christian missionaries in the empire. And the other influence, working along civil, secular, political lines, but almost always in harmony with that of the missionaries, is that of the many hundreds of young men who have been sent to study in Western lands, the great majority having spent several years at American universities and colleges. Those who have returned to China are almost invariably propagators of reform. Those still abroad have been in constant correspondence with the reformers all over China.

To Canton in December came a big squad of the famous and valiant "Ready-to-Die Brigade," that curious and redoubtable organization which was created in the Straits Settlements, where are located so many intelligent and affluent Chinese. On December 15 the "Ready-to-Die" warriors rushed into the Canton Temple of Horrors. But these invaders had no bloodthirsty intent. They entered the Hsing Wong Miao simply with the purpose of destroying every idolatrous image in that pantheon. They forthwith began to knock off the heads of all the 400 joss gods. The people in the streets crowded in to watch the extraordinary decapitation of the images. The beheading occupied hardly half an hour. Time was, not long since, when a fearful riot would have been caused by a single act of temple desecration of any kind; but on that morning, throngs of the inhabitants not only without a murmur watched the mutilation of every joss god, but also with equal tranquillity saw the procession of the executioners carrying the headless figures through the city, with shouts to the people that "their gods were useless," and with witty sallies at the joss-stick sellers and at the women who were coming to pay homage to those very gods.

Furthermore, these iconoclasts announced their resolve to smash all the joss gods in every temple throughout the city. Not a syllable of disapprobation was uttered by any of the onlookers, but, on the contrary, all along the route of the procession there were shouts of admiration. It was manifest that a new spirit had taken possession of the people. The men of Canton well knew that thousands of dollars were squandered every year, especially by women, on joss-sticks and paper. Among the ecclesiastics of the temple, the prospect of impoverishment has created consternation, for the Temple of Horrors brought in a large revenue, and as a part of this went to the secular authorities, these also did not relish the widespread change of sentiment. Accordingly, a few days later the Kwangtung officials issued a proclamation of a very astute and politic character. This document, while insisting on religious equality and toleration, severely reprehended the destruction of images in temples which were public property, built by public bodies. "It is most inopportune," said the manifesto, "to destroy these idols at this time and in this way. The correct way is for all those who have interests at stake to meet together, to discuss the problem, come to some satisfactory conclusion, and then proceed to action."

The time for such protests is past in China. The day of the josses, like that of the Manchus, is over. And, unquestionably, the mainspring of the great movement, which has unspeakably amazed the whole world, is the impact on the reformers of that Christian element which originated through contact with England and the United States of America. That was the influence which constrained Yuan Shi Kai, though he is a Confucianist, to send all his children to be educated at the schools established by Christian missionaries. That same spirit impelled him and two other great viceroys to disobey the late ruthless empress dowager at the time of the Boxer troubles, and to save the lives of many foreigners who must otherwise have been massacred.

Even the very name of China is to be changed. It will no longer be styled Chung Kwo (Middle Kingdom), but will be called Chung Hwa Kwo (Middle Flower Nation).

CHINA'S PRESENT CONDITION

BY Z. CHARLES BEALS, WUHU

CHINA is to-day much in the minds of the nations. The overthrow of the Manchu rule and the establishing of a republic has startled the world. We hear on every side this question: "Has the giant really awakened? What will he be like when fully aroused?" We can, with profit, look at the present conditions in the country, and try to answer some of the questions asked.

From an outside view, China has accomplished much. She has thrown off the Manchu rule and has elected a president pro tem., Dr. Sun Yat Sen. He has an optimistic view of things, and has shown good judgment and much wisdom. Most of the cabinet officers whom he has called around him are level-headed, bright men. An element also to be found in his yamen is composed of military generals without much experience or training, who, like all amateur soldiers, are anxious to demonstrate their prowess in the field. Among such the cry is, "On to Peking!" The consensus of advice given to the president is, "Beware of the Manchu," and while he himself is inclined to be frank and unsuspicious, there can be no doubt that this chorus has served to make him very cautious.

Sun Yat Sen is determined upon a republic. He is willing to leave the decision to the representatives of the people of China, but in doing so is quite confident that the portion of the people that can think or reason, or has any knowledge whatsoever of the government of their country, wants a republic. Furthermore, he believes the republic is the best form of government for China, and that it is practicable. He has had enough advice within the last month to confuse any ordinary man. He is not seeking foreign advice just at this time, and he says frankly that the temper of the people is such that the foreigner would play his best and most effective part as an onlooker.

One thing undoubtedly weighs very strongly with all these leaders, namely, that the bogy of foreign interference is continually before them. They are firmly convinced that but for the interference of foreign diplomats in Peking, and the selfish intrigue of the nations, the revolution would have been more speedily successful.

There is no getting away from the fact that China is greatly disturbed with internal disorders. There are lots of petty jealousies and bickerings, with fatal clashes at arms. Then there is the rabble element, which is robbing and pillaging in many provinces. Awful reports have come from inland. So far, the foreigners have been left alone, except in one instance. These roughs are taking their revenge out on the Manchus. At Sian the city gates were closed for four days while they were massacring 10,000 Manchus. Those deeds have been denounced by the republican leaders, as was also the attempt on the life of Yuan Shi Kai. At this writing the leaders are working together with greater unanimity and are getting things more and more in their grasp, and lawlessness is declining.

The year just closed has been dull indeed. Trade has been at a standstill. Warehouses are filled with goods. The tide seems to be turning, and we all believe good times and good business are just ahead for China.

Missionary work got a severe blow when the outbreak came. Young men of our schools laid down their books and took their stand with the revolutionary leaders. In some schools, one-half went to the front to fight for freedom. Two brothers in our school at Wuhu felt they must go. First, the youngest came to me and said he believed God wanted him to go and help free his country. His older brother, on hearing this, rushed up to me sobbing, and said, "No, my younger brother cannot go first; it is my place, as I am the elder brother." It took some time to persuade the younger brother to give up the idea of going. The older one went and has won distinction at the front. The church services and chapel meetings have been well attended, considering the excitement going on, but they, too, have suffered.

If you were to take the country just north of us here as a criterion or hope of the future, you would say it is black indeed, for hundreds of square miles are yet under water, which was caused by broken dikes of last summer. The famine fields stretch away as far as the eye can see. Sorrow and misery can be seen on every hand. One standing here feels like crying out, "Poor China!" Thousands of men and women without anything to eat, selling wives, sons and daughters—anything, so as to be able to buy a bite. Many thousands living on roots and bark of trees. The dikes are badly broken, and if not rebuilt before June, we shall have another flood, and all this misery over again. China needs your help now.

Helping the China Famine Orphans

AMONG the letters received during the week containing contributions in behalf of the 700 Chinese orphans (for whose provision THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has appealed to its readers) there are many that are touching. A little twelve-year-old maid of Paducah, Ky., writes: "I send $1, and wish I could send more, but I know that God will bless it. I love the Saviour and am going to pray for the little Chinese orphan children." "May the Lord bless you in your work for these his poor little ones," writes Mrs. N. P. H., Memphis, Tenn. ($5). "I am glad to see what you are doing for this cause," says the letter of H. R. A., Williamsburg, Pa. ($5). "I am praying that God will in some way open their eyes and understanding to the light as it is in Christ Jesus," writes Mrs. A. R. F., Baldwinsville ($5). "Just think of the poor heathen that are growing up to bless you."

The First Christian Church of Irvington, N. J., sends through Treasurer H. McDavit two remittances of $20 each, to be divided equally between the China Famine Fund and the Orphan Fund.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has cabled to the Missionary Committee at Chinkiang giving encouraging news of the gifts that friends are sending in for the support of the little orphans. It is hoped that a sufficient sum will be realized from the present effort to assure the support of the 700 children for some time to come, and thus to relieve the embarrassment of the missionaries who have the welfare of the children very deeply at heart. All gifts for this cause should be addressed "CHINA FAMINE ORPHAN FUND, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York."

Easter!

EASTER! Is there a happier word in all of human speech?

"There are never any hopeless cases any more so long as Jesus is around." A minister said this in his sermon the other Sunday evening in a village church. Isn't it a beautiful thing that despair is dead, now that Jesus lives? There need be no such thing as hopelessness any more. It does not make any difference how black the sin is, how sharp the pain is, how heavy the burdens are, how dark the outlook may be. The future, the burdens, the pain, the sin, touched with the Easter glory, are swallowed up in the bright light of hope.

For century after century mankind groped its way under the weight and in the darkness of two cruel curses, sin and death. Every soul knew that it was under an irrevocable sentence of death; every soul was smitten with the foul plague of sin. It is no wonder that there seems a strange hollowness, a weird mockery in so much of the laughter and the music of the world before Jesus came. Men under sentence of death play games in their cells and try to laugh, but their laughter echoes horribly through the damp vaults of the prison; men suffering from deadly maladies or deadly wounds make pretense of merriment, but it is sorry pretense. So souls sick with sin, and awaiting death, tried to be merry, but often there was the heaviest sorrow in the lightest laughter.

But an end to that now! There is no longer any such thing as death to them that believe in him. "If a man keep my saying, he shall never see death." Could there be any completer lifting of the death sentence than that? "Now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life." Can there be any sounder assurance than that—that we have been given a power over sin which is irresistible? "He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him."

Easter sunshine, Easter flowers, Easter bird-song, Easter hymn and anthem, Easter sermon, Easter testimony, Easter gladness—how radiant and how rich, how fragrant and how fresh, how comforting, how strengthening they are! Winter has passed; fear has vanished; sin is conquered; death is done away. Hail, risen Jesus, Master of our souls, Prince of Life, mighty Saviour, ardent, faithful, eternal Friend!

Our Caribbean Neighbors

SECRETARY KNOX'S tour of the Central American republics is not a junketing trip, nor is it, in the strict sense, an official mission. It may perhaps be properly called a friendly vacational visit to our Caribbean neighbors. It was somewhat unfortunate that a political color should have been given to it by the ill-considered note sent to our State Department by Señor Ospina, the Colombian minister, whose blunder has been disavowed by his government, which has recalled him by way of rebuke. There is no reason to anticipate any other than a cordial welcome for Secretary Knox from all the Central American States. They know we are not "spying out the land"—that we have no designs upon our neighbors, territorial or otherwise. They are beginning to realize that the time is near when they can, if they will, become important factors in the world's progress. With the completion of the Canal a new and larger future must open up for the chain of States contiguous to the Isthmus. They are our neighbors and we wish them well and would help rather than hinder their prosperity and happiness. In the very highway of commercial progress, if they are wise, they will prepare to reap the advantages of the vast development that must soon take place. It is clearly a time to send hotheads to the rear and to put in the forefront of affairs men of sagacity and experience, who are capable of taking a large view of the possibilities of the future. Secretary Knox carries with him the best wishes of the American people for the welfare and continued friendship of the Central American republics.

Why Not Public Markets?

WITH the prices of foodstuffs still at an almost inaccessible altitude, many plans are being devised for the purpose of eliminating the costly middleman, and bringing the producer and consumer into closer relations. In several localities, there is a movement for the revival of the open market in squares or other public places, where farmers can come and sell direct to the consumers on stated days. This is the method of earlier times, and it is not to be despised. Many now living can remember the open markets in towns and cities throughout the country, where produce of all kinds, fresh from the farm and innocent of even the suggestion of cold storage (which had not then been invented), was sold to thrifty housewives at extremely reasonable yet profitable prices. It would be a good thing if our American cities would encourage the opening of such markets generally. In most of the cities of Europe they are a familiar sight and a great convenience. One or two such markets in every leading city would do more to restore a reasonable standard of prices than all the housewives' leagues and co-operative associations put together. They would assure an abundant supply of fresh, wholesome foodstuffs, especially vegetables, fruit, butter, eggs, cheese and a miscellaneous assortment of other edibles, at prices within the reach of the average citizen, and would go very far toward restoring normal living conditions. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would suggest the trial of the open market wherever it could be established. Farmers, truck-raisers, millers, orchardists, poultrymen and many others would greatly welcome the change. We should be glad to hear the views of our readers on the subject and to receive any information concerning such markets in different parts of the country.

Worth While

WHEN the complete story of the Chinese revolution is told, it will be seen how largely the influence of Christian missionaries inspired moderation and averted bloodshed. Two striking illustrations of this class have come to notice, and we believe there are many others of the same kind. When Nanking was surrounded by 40,000 revolutionists, and defended by only 6,000 loyalists, there were about forty missionaries in the city. The fighting had been heavy for several days, and many were killed on both sides. Having tested the weakness of the defenders, the revolutionists demanded that the city surrender. This met with a prompt refusal, though the defenders knew their case to be hopeless. Then the revolutionary generals announced that an attack would be made against the city at eight o'clock next morning. The foreign consuls and other officials within the city tried in vain to dissuade the generals from their purpose, dreading the slaughter and devastation that must follow. Two missionaries, Dr. Macklin and the Rev. Frank Garrett, undertook the task of making peace. At four o'clock in the morning, accompanied by the American vice-consul and the general of the defending force, they set out for the revolutionary camp. Walking along the wall, lighted by a lantern, they were fired upon by the rebels, but kept on, and at daylight they descended, carrying with them an American flag and a white peace flag. The two missionaries brought the generals face to face. Terms were soon concluded and the revolutionary army entered the city without the sacrifice of a single life. What military leaders and foreign officials had failed to do, the ambassadors of Christ, who had preached to both the revolutionists and defenders, and who were known and trusted as men of God, successfully accomplished. Similarly, a missionary in Chuchow saved that city from an overwhelming revolutionary army, at the risk of his own life. Dr. Elliott T. Osgood, like Paul, was let down from the city wall, went alone to the enemy's camp, and persuaded the leader to turn his forces aside, and Chuchow was saved. In both instances, hundreds, if not thousands, of lives might have been sacrificed, had it not been for the courage of the Christian missionaries. Yet we find those who will ask, "Is it worth while?" All honor to the men who, with the Gospel in one hand and the peace flag in the other, on such a Christlike mission, could face the guns of an army!

Investigating at Lawrence

THE Federal Bureau of Labor has decided to investigate the strike at the textile mills of Lawrence, Mass. It will endeavor to learn the truth regarding conditions precedent to and during the strike, and to give a fair hearing and due consideration to the grievances of the workers. This is a case where investigation will be valuable only if it be thorough, practical and absolutely unbiased. Nearly $1,500,000 have already been lost to the workers by the strike. Had the arbitration proposition been accepted, the operatives would have returned to their places in the mills and fully half of this enormous waste of wages would have been saved. Besides, the efforts of the arbitrators would probably have resulted ere now in the substantial betterment of both factory and social conditions. It is to be sincerely hoped that a settlement may soon be reached, and that the present distressing conditions may be ameliorated. If any official effort should result in letting in the light on the situation, and showing clearly where the trouble lies, it will be greatly appreciated.

Gifts for China's Need

THE Famine Relief Committee in China is doing excellent work. Not only is it saving lives, but through deeds of practical kindness, it is spreading the influence of Christianity. We would urge our readers not to forget this gracious and timely work and to give it their generous support, and we would also remind them of the little orphan children, nearly 2,000 of whom are now in the care of the missionaries, 700 being practically unprovided for. A gift now to our "Famine Orphan Fund" will brighten the life of some poor little waif and bring a rich blessing to the giver.

General Notes

—WHILE AMERICAN PROTESTANT churches send out one missionary to every 3,000 members, the 750 Christians in Bolenge, Africa, support 76 native evangelists, whom they send out among unevangelized tribes.

—IN A LETTER dated New York, February 24, written to seven State governors who had asked him to define his position, Mr. Roosevelt has frankly announced himself a candidate for the presidency. His letter says: "I absolutely agree with you that this matter is not one to be decided with any reference to the personal preferences or interests of any man, but purely from the standpoint of the interests of the people as a whole. I will accept the nomination for President if it is tendered to me, and I will adhere to this decision until the convention has expressed its preference."

Bringing Gospel to Workshops

THE picture on this page represents a regular weekly scene in the molding room of the Modern Foundry Company at Cincinnati, where molders with grimy faces take part in a Y. M. C. A. religious service held every Thursday noon for twenty minutes, right in the foundry amid the molds. Once each week these molders gather in this religious service and give up part of their lunch hour to the singing of hymns, accompanied by a little portable organ and a cornet. This unique service has become very popular, and not one of the foundrymen stays away from this optional duty. Fortunately, meetings similar to those held in the Cincinnati foundry are being held in the shops of many of the cities of the country, and if the Y. M. C. A. of America did no more than carry on the shop evangelistic work, it would justify all the labor and expense of maintaining it. New York City has many of such meetings. In the summer time the Bible Institute and other organizations hold similar services. It is necessary for the safety of the nation that the church and the workers of the country should be in harmonious relationship. The popular claim that the laboring people have abandoned the church is far from the truth. The working people are the bone and sinew of the church everywhere. Atheism and anarchism have tried hard to break this relationship of labor to the church, and some have been led away by the temptation; but a majority of the laboring people are firmly established in their loyalty to the home, the church and the State. Not all the churches recognize the obligation, privilege and joy of ministering to the spiritual wants of those who labor with their hands. The Young Men's Christian Association and other organizations in these shop meetings have caught the spirit of the early disciples:

And daily in the temple, and in every house, they ceased not to teach and preach Jesus Christ. (Acts 5: 42.)

Fifty Thousand Lost Girls

GENERAL THEODORE BINGHAM, formerly Commissioner of Police in New York, recently declared: "There are fifty thousand young women and girls lost in the United States every year. They simply drop out of existence." Many of those who are lost to sight find honorable employment, but alas, a fearfully large number are drowned in the tides of vice and crime. Thousands of girls break away from the restraints of home and flock to the cities, where they are speedily lost. Thousands of ambitious young women seek the cities every year hoping to better their condition. Lacking experience and resources, they fall an easy prey to unscrupulous men who are always in search of unprotected women and girls. Under the pretense of conducting them to a hotel or the home of a friend they seek, they are decoyed by the infamous white slave masters into places and lives of shame. The nation should bestir itself to a vigorous enforcement of the law, and the church should take the sword of the Spirit and with it end the fearful slaughter. In a period of widespread corruption the prophet promised a Divine conqueror of these vicious monsters.

In that day the Lord with his sore and great and strong sword shall punish leviathan, the piercing serpent, . . . and he shall slay the dragon that is in the sea. (Isaiah 27: 1.)

Hopeful Sunday School Statistics

THE most enthusiastic optimism is awakened at the perusal of the advance statistics of the Methodist Sunday Schools for the year and the quadrennium, which shows these startling figures of increase, the latter being in each case for the four years: Schools 35,528, increase 1,352; officers and teachers, 412,517, increase 53,788; scholars, 3,629,-[illegible], increase 642,081; combined enrolment, 4,042,-[illegible], increase 695,869; conversions, 1908-11, 623,262. Nineteen missionaries in the field have organized 1,112 schools, with 42,000 members. Out of these have grown 345 missions, and from these 294 churches, with 117 new churches worth $226,650. In 7,182 adult Bible classes are enrolled 150,462 students. It is likely that the reports of the Sunday Schools of other denominations will show correspondingly encouraging results. There are perplexing problems to solve, there are real barriers that give excuse for temporary discouragement in the Lord's work, but no one can contemplate the education, the sanctification of young life by the Holy Spirit through the instrumentality of the church in her Sunday Schools and young people's organizations without the feeling of gratitude, and hope in Christ's certain and speedy conquest of the world. The work of the Sunday School in the study of the Scriptures is in obedience to the command given in the earliest period of Jewish history:

And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children. (Deut. 6: 7.)

James Whitcomb Riley's First Poem

HAMILTON J. DUNBAR, a brilliant young lawyer of Greenfield, Ind., died in 1876, and Rev. H. A. Buchtel, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Knightstown, Ind., officiated at the funeral. Close to the head of the coffin sat a sign-painter of Greenfield, who, like the whole village, idolized the deceased. The sign-painter went home and wrote a poem on Ham Dunbar, which he sent to the Indianapolis Journal. The poem was noticed so generally and received with such favor that he made up his mind that maybe there was something more for him to do in life than write names on signs of metal or wood. That painter and poet was James Whitcomb Riley. The poem, which is not included in Riley's published volumes, is as follows:

Dead! Dead! Dead!
We thought him more than
And none so proud to see him tread
The rounds of fame, and lift his head
Where sunlight ever shone:
But now our aching eyes are dim.
And look through tears in vain for him!

Name! Name! Name!
It was the theme
Not over-proud, only of fame,
Coupled with us together like a flame
Reflected in a gem.
He wears it blazing on his brow
Within the courts of Heaven now!

Tears! Tears! Tears!
Like dews upon the leaf
That [illegible]
The blossom of a trust appears
That [illegible]
And mother, brother, wife and child
[illegible]

Dr. Buchtel, who is chancellor of Denver University and an ex-governor of Colorado, made an exact copy of the poem and used it recently in his college exercises. We take special pleasure in giving this beautiful poem to our readers, most of whom have never seen it, because Ham Dunbar was our college mate, our bosom companion, and our ideal. We do not recall any one with keener intellect, larger heart, purer character, loftier ambition, and greater earthly promise. Had he lived he would probably have been heard from at the forefront of national achievement and patriotic service. James Whitcomb Riley has suffered a stroke of paralysis and says his work is done; but like the lyre of Orpheus, which, thrown into the river with the body of its dead master, sent forth the same sweet strains of music as when swept by living fingers, the lyre of the Hoosier poet will send out its lovely strains of melody years after he shall have been gathered to his fathers. It will be noticed that Riley's first poem, the one on his ideal and ours, was a vision of immortality. It reminds us of the Christian comfort the apostle gives:

But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope. (I. Thes. 4: 13.)

Wireless News for Islands

FOUR thousand inhabitants of the Magdalen Islands, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, who are shut off from communication with the mainland for six months of the year, are to receive the news of the world by wireless at the expense of the Canadian Government. Arrangements have been completed by the postmaster-general to have 1,000 words of the best news sent each week-end to the islanders. The service will begin immediately. The weekly messages will be delivered to the Protestant ministers and Catholic priests, to be read to their respective congregations at the close of the Sunday services. The Psalmist refers to good news brought to islands:

The Lord reigneth; let the earth rejoice; let the multitude of the isles be glad thereof. (Ps. 97: 1.)

$10,000 Purse Raised

MRS. ANNIE WALSH, widow of Battalion Chief Walsh, of the Fire Department of New York, who was killed in the Equitable fire, visited fire headquarters the other day at the request of Fire Commissioner Johnson, to receive a check for $10,363.77, contributed by hundreds of persons through various agencies. Commissioner Johnson said: "This sum, together with the lifting of the mortgage on your home and the annual pension of $1,000 a year which is paid to the widows of all firemen who lose their lives in the discharge of their duty, will at least keep out of your mind, as a mother, the dread of poverty." The commissioner said: "His steady advancement through all grades of the service speaks for itself. His devotion to the service was manifested not only in the example which he set to his men in the very monotonous routine of firehouse duty, but in an unsurpassed zeal in the never-ceasing battles. His service to the department and to the city would have been enough had he lived and kept up through his career his energetic and faithful work. But in the end he laid down upon the altar of duty and public service the supremest sacrifice—his own life." The gift to the family of the hero, which was as just as generous, only echoed the voice of the people and, we believe, of the Master also.

Well done, good and faithful servant. (Matt. 25: 23.)

Dying Man His Brother

THE other night as Lieutenant-General Nelson A. Miles, U.S.A., retired, was motoring along Pennsylvania Avenue in Washington, a man walking briskly through the twilight in Lafayette Park, opposite the White House, crumpled down in a heap, then sprawled on the pathway. General Miles left his car to peer over the heads of the crowd that gathered. "It's my brother," said the general, when he saw the upturned face. Then he took the body up in his arms and carried it to his automobile. Daniel C. Miles was the man's name. He lived in Westminster, Mass., and was visiting the general. The coroner said his heart had failed. We are jostled in the throng. We are walking or driving our wheels in the highway, and we are always surprised and shocked as death stops the procession, forgetting that the most certain thing in life is its uncertainty. The Psalmist thus pictures its frailty:

In the morning they are like grass which groweth up. In the morning it flourisheth, and groweth up; in the evening it is cut down, and withereth. (Ps. [illegible])

A $7,000,000 FIRE AT HOUSTON

ON FEBRUARY 21, the most destructive fire in the history of the city of Houston, Texas, swept an area one mile and a half in length, and varying in width from two hundred yards to half a mile, practically bare. More than a dozen of the city's most important industrial enterprises are in ruins, over two hundred dwelling houses and store buildings were reduced to ashes, and approximately one thousand persons were rendered homeless.

An accurate statement of the monetary loss is not yet possible, but the most conservative estimate is that it will reach at least $7,000,000, and it is believed that the insurance carried will not exceed 40 per cent. Except for a few who suffered minor burns and bruises, there were no casualties attendant upon the fire.

The fire started in an untenanted rooming house, known locally as the "Mad House," shortly after one o'clock in the morning, when a fierce gale was sweeping from the northwest. Buffalo Bayou divides the city, running east and west, and it was not until the conflagration had reached its bank that the slightest headway could be made toward checking it. Except for an occasional dip across the stream, the line of destruction ended there.

In the early morning hours the gale continued fiercely and at times hurled clouds of burning shingles and fire great distances, and threatened, among others, the plants of the Texas Oil Company and the Houston Packing Company. The latter was damaged considerably. Several times the roof of the oil plant caught fire, but the blaze each time was quickly extinguished. The industrial plants destroyed include three cotton compresses, together with 55,000 bales of cotton, a syrup factory, a pencil factory, two rice mills, a cotton-picking plant, and three lumber yards. The compresses and cotton alone were valued in excess of $5,000,000. Quick action was taken for the relief of those made homeless, but outside aid, when offered, was declared unnecessary. Telegrams were sent by the mayors of Louisville and Boston and the president of the Merchants' Association of New York, proffering aid, but to these Mayor Rice replied that Houston could meet every need.

A General View of the Burned District of Houston, Texas

Among the mills, factories, and plants that were either totally destroyed or seriously damaged by the fire are: McFadden Southern Compress and Warehouse Company, Dew Brothers' Syrup Mill, Houston & Liggett Lumber Company, Rogers Paint Company, Hudson's Pencil Factory, Houston Packing Company, Ed. H. Harrell Lumber Yards, Standard Company, the Co-operative Manufacturing Company, Acme Mills, Cleveland Compress and Cotton Warehouse, McIlhenny Cotton Pickery, Texas; Tinners' Supply Company, Industrial Rice Milling Company's plant, Southwestern Rice Company's mill, Hoosier Vinegar Company's plant, and a number of lesser mills. Thirty-six Southern Pacific cars loaded with cotton bales were burned.

Mr. Taft Against a Postal Telegraph

IN a message sent to Congress on February 22, President Taft announced his disapproval of Postmaster-General Hitchcock's proposition for government ownership and operation of telegraph lines. He did not agree with the claim that lower rates and more efficient service would result from government ownership; nor did he agree with the proposition to make the telegraphs a part of the postal system, to be operated in conjunction with the mail system. The message continued:

I believe that the true principle is that private enterprise should be permitted to carry on such public utilities under due regulation as to rates by proper authority, rather than that the government should itself conduct them. This principle I favor because I do not think it in accordance with the best public policy thus greatly to increase the body of public servants. More than this, it seems to me that the consideration of the question ought to be postponed until after the postal savings banks have come into complete and smooth operation and after a parcels post has been established, not only upon the rural routes and the city deliveries but also throughout the department. It will take some time to perfect these additions to the activities of the Post Office Department and we may well await their complete and successful adoption before we take on a new burden in this very extended department.

The President pointed out that there was a postal surplus of $219,118.12 at the end of 1911, compared with a deficit of $17,479.47 two years before. He approved the adoption of a parcels post. He also sent to Congress the report of the Commission on second-class mail matter, recommending that the rate on magazines and newspapers be raised from one cent to two cents a pound.

In approving the two-cent rate, however, President Taft says that the business of the publishers of periodicals has been built up on the basis of the one-cent rate, and therefore it would be manifestly unfair to put a larger increase in postage into immediate effect. A reasonable time should be allowed after the rate is fixed before it is put into effect. He admits that the newspapers and magazines have been potent agencies for the dissemination of public intelligence, and consequently have borne a worthy part in the development of the country. He then proceeds to repeat the old argument that while second-class matter embraces over 65 per cent. of the entire weight of all the mail carried, it yields little more than 5 per cent. of the postal revenues. The proposed increase of one cent a pound he therefore considers reasonable.

The commission upon whose report the President's recommendations are based included Justice Charles E. Hughes, of the Supreme Court; A. Lawrence Lowell, president of Harvard University, and Harry A. Wheeler, president of the Chicago Association of Commerce. It is believed that the proposed increase of postal rate would operate very seriously in the case of many publications, and would compel a general advance in the published prices of magazines and periodicals all along the line.

At the hearing, a year ago, it was demonstrated that the proposed increase in second-class postal rate was unnecessary, and would be an injustice to the press of the country. Facts and figures were produced to prove that the Post Office Department, under proper management, would show a surplus instead of a deficit, and this has proved to be true, since, as the result of economy, the last fiscal year produced a surplus of over $219,000. As the postmaster-general's contention was that the second-class mail rate of one cent per pound was the cause of the original deficit, the showing of last year's business takes away altogether the force of this latest argument and demonstrates that it was lack of business system and proper economy in other directions that caused the deficit, which has now been transformed into a surplus. But the President and postmaster-general seem resolved to urge upon Congress the addition of a needless postal tax upon the newspapers, periodicals and magazines, which must ultimately become a burden upon the people themselves, since a large majority of these publications, should such a measure become a law, will be compelled to increase their present prices. At the close of the last session of Congress, the bill for the increased postal rate never reached a vote, nor will any bill of the same character do so at the present session, if Congress looks at the matter squarely and with full understanding of all the circumstances. It would be an injustice and onerous burden upon the reading public, imposed to gratify the administration, and especially the post office management, which is densely oblivious to the fact that the periodical press of a number of other countries is carried by mail at a lower rate than ours, and at a profit! Further, neither Mr. Taft nor Mr. Hitchcock seem to give a moment's consideration to the great multitude of newspaper, magazine and periodical readers, who include practically the entire population of the country. Such a bill would be a stupid blow at the reading public. In striking at the press, newspapers included, Congress would be strangely unmindful of the fact that its act would deprive millions of readers in all the States of the privilege they now enjoy in their homes, where cheap periodical literature, in the forms of dailies, weeklies and monthlies, is a large contributor to popular education and enlightenment on the great issues of the times. We predict for such a measure the inglorious fate of its predecessor.

Another Revolution In Mexico

PRESIDENT MADERO'S rule in Mexico is being threatened by another revolution. The President is accused of being too friendly with the United States, and the rebels are endeavoring to put Emilio Vasquez Gomez in the presidential chair.

On February 27 the town of Juarez, directly across the Rio Grande River from El Paso, Tex., was captured by a force of revolutionists under the command of General Campa. There was practically no resistance on the part of the town, which fact is said to be due to the warning given by the United States that there must be no firing which will endanger life and property on the American side of the border. The Twenty-second Regiment and two batteries of the Third Light Artillery have been ordered to proceed from Fort Sam Houston to El Paso. The President has declared that if his warning is disregarded and shots are found to carry across the border, the American troops will proceed to Mexico and take a hand in the disturbances.

The capture of Juarez by the rebels is not considered to have the same significance now that the conquest of the same city had under the forces of General Madero in the former revolution. In the former case it was the most important event of a long series of successful operations. While its present capture by the rebels may not be a serious blow to the administration, it will doubtless lead to more vigorous and important maneuvers on the part of the revolutionary army. After the capture of the city, General Campa proceeded southward toward the city of Chihuahua.

Already complications have arisen over the capture of Americans in Mexico, charged with aiding the revolutionists. Seven Americans were taken at Fronteras, Mex., and placed under guard.

General Trevino has been mentioned as a possible presidential candidate, and General Orozco was thought at one time to be in sympathy with the rebels, but both of these officers are remaining faithful to the administration.

A CELEBRATION IN QUAINT SIAM

Making Friends with a Bear Cub

A Glimpse of One of Siam's Frequent River Processions

A Baby Elephant Begging for Sweets

IT WOULD be a great revelation to most of those in the homeland to see the wonderful combination of magnificence and simplicity, of the modern and the ancient, the European and the Oriental, the civilized and the barbarous, that reflects the tropic sun of this strange land, Siam. In its cities one finds on every hand the evidences of the modern tendencies of the country's late king, Chulalongkorn, and of its new sovereign, Vaajiravudh; yet the life of the jungles is never far from the outlying plantation, and often comes to the very doors of the dwellers in towns and small cities. Usually one of the first things to be commented upon by an observant traveler who journeys into the interior is the apparent disregard for man's presence that is displayed by animals which elsewhere ordinarily flee at his approach. As the Siamese are nominally Buddhists, they have the deepest respect for life in any form, and reverence it even in the lowest animals. The lower classes will endure almost any amount of discomfort and even face grave personal danger rather than molest an animal. This often brings about very strange occurrences. It is only a few months ago that Mr. Ray Peoples, son of Dr. S. C. Peoples, shot a full-grown tiger, which was known to be a man-eater, within the city limits of Nan, one of the leading cities of the Laos States.

Siam is pre-eminently the land of animals, and not a few of those which pass and repass in the course of the day's work keep the new arrival waiting to hear a steam calliope inform the countryside that a circus is in town. There goes the sacred Indian buffalo! But this time he and his brother are only going, under the charge of two small boys, down into the rice paddy behind the temple to plow. Stripped of all his gay trappings, the elephant, no longer a mere show, goes peacefully, patiently and intelligently about his herculean tasks. Two of these splendid animals carried or dragged all the heavy timbers for the boys' school which was recently erected at Nan.

The whole elephant tribe is looked upon with great veneration by the Siamese. The elephant is the symbolic animal of the country, and though his ponderous strength is daily used in his master's service, he is man's co-laborer, not his beast of burden. Lucky is that elephant who is born an albino; for he shall be all his days a sacred white elephant, scrubbed and fattened and pampered, and he shall do no work at all. Even the baby who is a little lighter gray than his relatives may attain to greatness. Only a few months ago one of these baby elephants that was only light gray in color, not a true albino, was shipped with great ceremony from Laos to the king at Bangkok. Animals large and small abound in the jungles and along the waterways. No trip need be taken without a plentiful supply of game, for "fan" deer, quail, queen pigeons and peafowl may be had for the table at the expense of a little patience and a good straight shot.

In Nan the governor (chow luang or Great Prince) has just completed the beautiful palace which has been in course of construction for nearly ten years, and which has cost upward of $40,000. On November 1 and 2 last the ceremonies in connection with the opening of this new official residence were held. The palace is situated near the center of the city and is surrounded by splendid grounds enclosed by a high brick wall. The building itself is of brick, the outside of its walls being plastered with a hard, shiny-finished cement. The main part of the structure measures 40 by 120 feet and has a wing measuring 40 by 50 feet on each side. The Hall of Audience, which is a splendid apartment measuring 40 by 60 feet, is on the second floor of the building and is reached by two exterior stairways. The sleeping apartments occupy the two wings and the whole lower floor is utilized for business offices and store rooms. Heavy ornamental awnings protect all the windows and the wide portico of the audience hall from the tropical sun. Great attention is given to the finishing of the gables. As the ox is recognized as the tutelar spirit of Nan, it is depicted in the center with two dragons on either side. Other gables are finished with fine scroll work in teak. The roof is in native style with the customary huge gilded horn rising above each gable. The whole effect is very pleasing.

The governor of the state, who has just moved into this splendid residence, is eighty-one years of age, and though still erect and capable, sight and hearing are both gradually failing him. He enjoys the deepest respect from the people of his province, as no modern reform has lacked his endorsement. He has built bridges and improved the roads, making possible trade and communication where formerly there were only jungle trails. The opening of the new palace was a great event in Nan. Thousands of people gathered to see the ceremonies and join the festivities. All the missionaries had written invitations to the functions and the dinner, and attended in a body.

The dedication services of the Buddhist priests were held in the afternoon of the first day. The missionaries attended this service and were shown marked attention by the governor and high officials. We were seated in the large reception room where the ceremony was held. On one side of the room were fifteen priests in their yellow robes seated upon a raised platform and at the farther end was an altar on which were placed images of Buddha illuminated by tall wax candles. Beside the altar stood the throne-chair with its crimson silk cushions bearing the wonderful gold crown, the great sword with its golden scabbard inlaid with jewels, and a brilliant array of decorations. One wide gold chain for the shoulders was truly magnificent. Near the altar stood a table with a spread heavily embroidered with gold. On this were placed the gold vessels belonging to the office of governor, vases, betel box, water bottle, teapot and goblets. A life-sized painting of the governor occupied the place of honor above the altar. This was one of many gifts he received on this occasion. Two elephant tusks five feet in length, a handsome mirror, and many other presents were laid out for show. A black tusk three feet long and six inches in diameter was a great curiosity. It appeared to be petrified, and was an heirloom in the governor's family. The walls were decorated with family pictures, crossed swords, spears, and other weapons of war used long ago. Upon the floor were handsome rugs. There was a long cord attached to the altar and extending along the line of priests, each priest holding the cord in one hand while chanting.

Mr. Ray Peoples, Mr. Wm. McCluskey and Some of the Mission Children with the Slain Tiger

"At eleven o'clock the following morning, after an address upon the lawn, the governor was escorted to his new mansion by all the high officials and his friends. There with great respect all tendered their congratulations. The afternoon was given up to sports. One event that was heartily enjoyed was a tug of war between the governor's big elephant and eighty men. It was a pretty even pull, but the men finally took the prize. I suppose the elephant could stand defeat better than the eighty men!

"The great attraction was the evening feast. The grounds and building were brilliantly illuminated with gas and Japanese lanterns; the full moon was shining in all its tropical brightness; thousands of white elephant flags fluttered in the breeze, while bands of music added to the gaiety of the moving throng. The dinner hour was seven P.M.—for the ladies! It was nine o'clock before the men were seated at table. as they waited while the ladies were served first! The princesses wore their glittering cloth-of-gold garments, modern chiffon blouses, with gaily embroidered scarfs and a blaze of jewelry. Mrs. Peoples, Mrs. Palmer, and Miss Van Vranken, who were present, report a very enjoyable time. The men while waiting were entertaind by a native string band, while two tiny little girls gave some pretty dances, Dr. Peoples, Mr. Palmer, and your humble servant enjoying it all among the rest. We greatly enjoyed meeting the high officials, princes, and judges. At nine P.M. we were invited into the large reception room where a table was spread for twenty-four. The dinner was served in European style, competent Chinese waiters being in attendance.

The Ups and Downs of La Paz

A Bolivian Band Concert Before the President's Palace

A Typical Scene in La Paz

CALLAO, PERU

THE physical situation and political condition of Bolivia, after its independence from Spain and until comparatively modern times, are illustrated by an anecdote related of a consul for Holland. The consul, who had suffered serious injury through the illegal action of an executive, personally demanded redress from the president. On being informed by the president that he was acquainted with the circumstances, but could not intervene, the consul replied, affirming his right "as a diplomatic representative of the Paises Bajos" (Low Countries). "Muy bien" (very well), replied the president; "but I control the Paises Altos (High Countries), and if you make any trouble I will put you in prison and keep you there."

Clifford Speck, ready for the march

In territorial extent, Bolivia stands third among the republics of South America and is one of the two without a seaport. Her natural outlet to the Pacific Ocean was taken by Chile at the end of the war of the Pacific, and to-day she is shut off from the sea like Switzerland. La Paz, Oruro and Potosi are all cities standing over 12,000 feet above the level of the sea. Bolivia's economic advance during recent years has been noteworthy, particularly in the line of railroad extension. La Paz, Lake Titicaca, Oruro and Potosi are all linked with Antofagasta on the Pacific Coast, and express trains carry passengers from La Paz, the capital, to Antofagasta on the sea-coast in two days.

Three centuries of Spanish domination and nearly a century of political independence have done little to produce, or to lay a solid foundation for, a sound system of public education in any way adequate to the needs of the country. Primary education for the Quichua and Aimara Indian element, which forms the bulk of the population, hardly exists, and probably not one Indian in a hundred can read. What there is in the way of secondary education is largely monopolized by the aristocracy and the better classes of the country. A few have passed from these institutions to the universities, but the great bulk of the people of Bolivia to-day are entirely ignorant of the benefits of education.

As Bolivia is breaking away from the ecclesiastical shackles that have bound her for centuries, the people are recognizing that there is uplifting power in Protestant Christianity. Evangelical forces are steadily increasing in number and are deepening their influence on the national character. Quite recently the writer was present at an influential meeting in the city of La Paz, called by some of its leading citizens, with the avowed object of inviting the Young Men's Christian Association of New York to establish a branch of that organization in the capital of Bolivia. It is a notable fact that movements set on foot by evangelical Protestants for educational development and uplifting of the down-trodden Indian have deservedly met with considerable encouragement and support from the Bolivian Government.

Indian Motherhood in Bolivia

One of these movements, the American Institute, during the few years of its existence, has already secured for itself a national reputation for a good modern education based on American principles. This school is situated in one of the most picturesque spots in the beautiful valley in which La Paz nestles, and which the traveler having once seen can never forget. The majority of the staff of teachers is composed of graduates from American colleges and educational institutes, who, inspired by missionary zeal and love, have left kith and kin to work for the upbuilding of this people whose home is on the roof of South America.

Evangelical activities in Bolivia are carried forward by the Methodist Episcopal Board, the Canadian Baptists, an Australian band of evangelists and other independent workers. The two great Bible Societies are also at work. Let us follow Clifford Speck, an American, with the Bible on the great elevations of Bolivia. Leaving Oruro in company with another worker they set out for Cochabamba, traveling by train as far as Capinota. After leaving the train they traveled on foot for about thirty-eight leagues with their knapsacks filled with books. They were able to sell every book they carried with them. Speck took with him a large supply of books and on entering the camp he found the manager ready to do everything possible for him. "Sell all you can, and if they have not got the money," said he, "take their orders and I will pay you and deduct it from their wages." "It was a real pleasure," writes Speck, "to hand out the Bibles. Lighter in weight and encouraged in heart we proceeded towards a village, made our inquiries, and set out for our return trip. Suddenly the sky overclouded and a heavy mountain shower came down with great force. We took refuge in an Indian's hut. In a short time the storm was over, but the streams which we had crossed in the morning had swollen considerably. As the stronger of the two I had to carry my companion across several of them. This took place at an altitude of some 11,000 feet. The water was surely cold enough."

Potosi, which was once a flourishing city of some 150,000 people, is to-day tottering to the ground, reduced to a population of some 12,000, supported principally by the mint, and other hangers-on who eke out an existence in connection with the silver mines. Going into the city, Clifford Speck sold out his books. He entered quite a number of houses whose inmates had already bought Bibles and were much pleased and interested in his visit. In a conversation with one of them he found a family that had been reading the Bible and lending it to other friends who were inquiring where they could obtain a copy.

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—IN THE LAST twelve months, 423 persons were killed by vehicles in New York streets—a death toll 13 per cent. higher than the year preceding. Two thousand and four were injured during the year from the same cause. Reckless motoring is responsible for a very large proportion of these accidents. One of the worst features of this record of criminal recklessness is that sixty of the cowards ran away to avoid identification and arrest after killing or maiming their unfortunate victims. Surely the city authorities, backed by adequate laws, should be able to stop this needless slaughter and to punish the criminals who are responsible for it.

—THE POSITION OF THOSE of the mill operatives of Lawrence, Mass., who are still on strike, refusing to recognize the compromise effected between some of their fellows and the mill owners, was brought more fully to the attention of the public a short time ago by a clash between them and the police of the city. It was the intention of the managers of the strike to send a number of the children of the strikers to Philadelphia and Providence to be cared for by sympathizers in a way similar to that adopted in sending 200 children to New York. The city officials issued an order that the children should not be allowed to leave the city and a score of policemen were on duty at the station to see that the order was carried out. There was a scene of wild disorder. The children were prevented from going on board the train. A number of arrests of men, women and children were made. Most of the adults were either fined or sent to jail, while the children were released in the custody of the probation officer.

—THE CHORUS OF FAREWELL messages and assurances of welcome to the republics of the South which greeted Secretary Knox as he started on his official journey through Central and South America was disturbed by an unexpected and inharmonious note from General Pedro Nel Ospina, minister to the United States from Colombia, which informed Mr. Knox that he might not be welcome at Cartagena. The reason for this surprising information was declared to be that "the citizens of Colombia are naturally deeply aggrieved to find their country the only one in the world with which the United States refuses to enter into a treaty of arbitration." There was a little furor over this incident and it was not till cablegrams stating that the Colombian Government was as surprised as any one by the announcement that Americans began to see the real standing of affairs. On fuller information the Colombian Government entirely disclaimed official connection with General Ospina's note and extended to Mr. Knox a hearty invitation to visit its capital. Very much to the chagrin of the officials of the government at Washington, General Ospina was, a few days later, recalled to Colombia. The general was considered to be much less dangerous to the peace of his country in Washington than at home with his acknowledged popularity and a grievance.

THE YOUTHFUL SOUL

A Tale of The Great Highway. By David DeForest Burrell

IN a certain house by the Great Highway there lived a Youthful Soul. The house was one of perhaps two score little houses that went to the making of a Village straggling along the road. And the Village was like all other villages. Old folk were there, sitting in the sun by the wall; and babies, toddling about the dooryards.

Rich folk were there, in a comfortable, fresh-painted, brass-knockered house; and poor folk, whose gate hung by a hinge, and whose house was shedding its ancient paint in great scales. Clean folk were there, clean in body and soul; and folk who hid soiled souls in clean bodies; and slovenly folk who cared not for cleanness within or without. Proud folk were there, and humble folk; sober folk, and sots; kind folk and unkind; folk who thought and folk who never thought above the chickens in their yards. It was just like every other village on the Great Highway; and it was the Home of this Youthful Soul.

"A CERTAIN HOUSE BY THE GREAT HIGHWAY"

It so happened that the Youthful Soul began to think on things. As he went to his work day after day (he was apprenticed to the carpenter) he was wont to look up and down the road with wide, questioning eyes. From the far distance, over the plain, the road ran toward the Village; and he wondered whence it came. The neighbors said it came to them after it had passed through many and many a village and town and city; and the lad longed to travel up the road to see. But chiefly he was curious about what lay in the other direction. For the road made its dusty way through the Village and on over the plain until, in the far distance, it entered a deep Valley and was lost in dark shadows.

"OLD FOLK . . . IN THE SUN BY THE WALL"

Many people traveled that road to the Dark Valley; and the Youthful Soul longed to know what lay beyond. He could see nothing. Time and again he stood before the shop door and shaded his eyes with his hand and gazed down the road toward the Valley; but the shadows over the Valley were impenetrable, and they never lifted. But something, surely, lay beyond the darkness. The Great Highway, so full of people journeying that way, would not end in darkness—so he thought. A road must lead somewhere—so he thought.

He observed that every little while one of his own neighbors would take his journey toward the Dark Valley. Some of them seemed to know that they must go, and to be well prepared, setting their affairs in order, bidding their housefolk a tender good-by, and starting out with cheerful face toward the shadows. Indeed, they seemed to be well assured that beyond the shadows they would come out into the light. But there were others who, knowing that they must journey through the Dark Valley, seemed much afraid, and unready to go; and they trembled and clung to their dear ones, so that it was pitiful to see.

And some there were who seemed to have had no warning of the journey. The Village banker was one of these. When the Village awoke one morning he was gone. He left a pile of unsigned papers on his desk—very important papers; and his notebook was full of engagements for days to come; so that the Youthful Soul expected him to come back; but he never came. The young mother who lived just across the road, she did not know, either, that she must go. So, at least, it seemed to the Youthful Soul; for he had seen her cuddling her baby in her arms so often; and he was sure she would not have left the little one alone if she had known.

Many times he woke to find that some one had started on the journey in the night. Once or twice, when that some one happened to be a person who had been very sick, no one seemed surprised; but usually the Village was deeply disturbed and distressed. There seemed to be no certainty as to the order of going. Old men and children, men and women in the prime of their strength, helpless babes; the tenure of life in the Village seemed very uncertain to the Youthful Soul. He wondered now and then whether he must go too; and when it would be. He did not wish to go; and yet he had an insatiable curiosity to know whether the Great Highway ever did come out of the shadows, at the other end of the Dark Valley; and, if it did, what was there.

Of one thing he thought often. It seemed very odd, but those who had spent all their lives in gathering together their possessions went off to the Valley without them. There was the old man who lived in the little hut at the end of the Village. The lad peeped in at the door when he heard that the old man was going on the journey; and he saw him lying on his miserable cot, clutching a great heavy bag in his skinny fingers; but in the morning he heard that the old man had gone in the night and had left the bag lying on the counterpane. Then he discovered that everybody who journeyed to the Dark Valley left everything behind; and he wondered why. Of course, the babies that went could not take anything; but then, some one would look after the babies. There would be some one to do that. But these grown folk, with all their money, why did they take none with them? And if they knew they could not take it, why did they work so hard to get it?

There was another thing on which the Youthful Soul pondered. Those who were left behind, when some one took the journey to the Dark Valley, conducted themselves in such strange ways. After the old man in the hut had gone, every one seemed to be quite glad. So, after the town drunkard had suddenly dropped his mug on the tavern floor and set out for the Valley, even his wife had seemed relieved, though she had cried a little at first. But there were others who were broken-hearted when their folk set out on the journey. When the little mother over the way went, her husband was like one bereft of reason. They put the baby in his arms, but he could not bear the sight of it—which was wrong of him, so the Youthful Soul thought as he puzzled over it. The next morning, when the sun woke the Village, they found that the man had set out in the night to follow his wife to the Dark Valley. And that, too, seemed to the Youthful Soul to be a grievous wrong; for the man had left his work undone, and he had left the baby alone. And all the Village seemed to agree with the Youthful Soul; for all spoke in whispers, and seemed appalled. There were others, too, whom no one could comfort when their folk left them for the Dark Valley. They would go out and sit by the road and look off to where the road disappeared in the shadows of the Valley; and they would weep as if their hearts were broken. They seemed to think they would never again see the travelers who had gone. And others were stunned. They could not cry. They went about their daily tasks like people in a dream. The Youthful Soul thought this was very strange in some of them, for hitherto they had spoken of the Dark Valley in such a tone of assurance; and the travelers had even promised them that they would wait for them on the other side of the shadows; but they seemed to have forgotten all of that.

There were some left behind who were for a few days overwhelmed with grief; and they seemed to try to forget. The banker's wife went off to another and a larger town, and saw many sides of life, and kept herself busy with many people; and after a time she did forget; or so it seemed. The village smith, after his wife went on the journey, said never a word, but worked hard and harder, day and night. The Youthful Soul, many a night, saw the light shining through the smithy door, and heard the clang of the sledge; and he knew that the smith was trying to forget that his wife had gone on the journey to the Dark Valley. But there were some in the Village who, when their dear ones left, went on their way, saddened a little, with eyes more thoughtful, but still with a peaceful joy in life that made the Youthful Soul wonder whether they had not some secret knowledge of the Dark Valley and of whatever lay beyond it.

The carpenter, in whose shop the lad worked, was one of these. His wife and his children had all left him and gone on the journey to the Valley. He lived alone, in a cottage beside the shop. The neighbors would have had him live with them; but he shook his head and smiled a quiet smile. There he lived alone, and cared for the roses his wife's hand had planted. Many an evening the Youthful Soul had found him leaning on the gate, looking off down the road through the shadows toward that deeper shadow that lay beyond; but always on his face was the same quiet peace. It was in his voice, as well, one night when the lad spoke to him thus by the roadside:

"You seem always to be seeing something yonder," said the Youthful Soul.

The carpenter smiled through the dusk. "Aye, that I am, lad. I see a light—I see it more clearly every evening."

"But I can't see anything," said the lad in puzzled complaint. "I have looked and looked, and I see only the road hiding in the shadows, and nothing more."

"But there is more, lad," answered the carpenter.

"How do you know?"

"I have a Friend," said the man. "He told me. I knew no more than you, until I met him."

"Where can I find him?" asked the Youthful Soul; "for I want very much to know."

"You can find him here, in the Village, by the Great Highway," the man replied. "He is always on the Highway, speaking to people. Wait. You will find him. Those who look for him are wont to meet him soon or late."

"How shall I know him?" queried the lad.

And the carpenter smiled again (though the lad

"HE WAS WONT TO LOOK UP AND DOWN THE ROAD WITH WIDE, QUESTIONING EYES"

THE YOUTHFUL SOUL

could not see it through the darkness), and he answered, "When you look into his face, you will know him, lad."

Every day, now, the Youthful Soul questioned all he met, asking what they knew about the Dark Valley and the Land Beyond. They gave him many answers. When he spoke to the blacksmith, the man's face went white, and he shook his head without a word, and struck fiercely at the white-hot iron on his anvil. He asked the man who had come into possession of the bag left behind by the old miser; but the man sent him off with a shrill curse. He asked the town drunkard (before the poor wretch went himself on the journey), and for answer got a jeering:

"What do I know of the Valley? Nothing, lad, nothing; only I hope to my soul there's nothing beyond!"

He asked another, but he shuddered and daintily but firmly changed the subject. "My dear lad," he said, "we don't talk about the Dark Valley in good society. It's not proper. It disturbs people—makes them think. They don't want to think. Never mention it again, I beg of you."

He asked the good wife who lived next door to the carpenter; but she only said, "Bless you, young man! I haven't time to stop to talk of such things!"

Then he went to the man who sat now in the banker's place, and asked him; but the man did not even look up from the correspondence he was reading; he merely shook his head. He asked of a mother, singing, her child in her arms; and she said, "Beyond the Valley? Some say, heaven; but I think this is heaven enough." Then he plucked up courage and addressed the Wisest Man in the village, who smiled a superior smile and said, "Beyond the Valley? Nothing, I assure you. The researches of modern science go to show that we are but part of a material universe; its finest product, so far, but still mere clay, so to speak." And the Youthful Soul was cast down; but the carpenter, when he told him, only said, "Poor man! he does not know my Friend."

"Neither do I," said the lad.

"There's a difference," the man returned. "You want to know him."

* * *

One day the carpenter fell ill. The lad was working alone in the shop. A Stranger came along the dusty Highway and sat down in the open doorway to rest. And the lad, as he worked, eyed the Stranger and, after a time, spoke to him of the thing in his heart.

"You came from up the Road?"

"Aye, from many, many places, the world over."

"It may be," said the lad, "you have been this way before?"

"Yes, truly," answered the other, with a strange look on his face.

The lad ventured further. "It may be," he said, "you can tell me what I long to know. Whither runs the Road through the Dark Valley? and what lies beyond?"

The Stranger looked at the Youthful Soul. "Why would you know?" he asked.

"So many folk journey to the Dark Valley," the lad returned. His plane lay idle. He leaned against the doorpost. "Truly," said the other. "All make that journey, soon or late."

"But why?" the lad persisted.

"Their breath is in their nostrils," the Stranger said. "Their strength is but labor and sorrow: for it is soon gone, and they fly away."

But the lad looked out through the door, and saw the pretty village with its gardens and its homes and its dear folk; and he said regretfully, "It is so pleasant here."

The Stranger's eyes kindled. "It is a good land," he agreed; "but there is a better. The greater part of life is yet to be lived beyond the Valley yonder. This world looks big to your eyes, lad; but it is not big enough for the soul of an immortal man. Not big enough—nor good enough. Under these green trees do not men quarrel and bicker and bite and hate and hurt? Do not men soil their own souls with unclean things? See!" He pointed to his feet. "The dust of the Highway is on me. Yet beyond the Valley there is a Land where no traveler is travel-stained. A better world, lad, yonder!"

"A Land—there?" asked the Youthful Soul eagerly. "What kind of a land?"

"Mine own country," said the Stranger.

"And what is there in your own country?"

"The City of my Father lies there," answered the other, with a great light upon his face. "And therein, my Father's House. There are many mansions for all who will come. And my Father—he dwells in their midst; and he wipes away every tear from their eyes; and there is no mourning, nor crying, nor pain any more. And the gates of the City are never shut—that all who come may enter; and they that have entered the City go no more out, nor pass ever again through the Valley of the Shadow. There is no shadow there, no night; and they need no light of lamp, neither light of sun; for my Father gives them light."

"THEY WOULD WEEP AS IF THEIR HEARTS WERE BROKEN"

"Is it a long journey through the Valley?" the lad asked.

"Not so long but that he who looks for the Valley's end can see it from the beginning."

"But is it a dark way? Are the shadows so deep?"

"Very deep are the shadows," said the Stranger gravely; "but not so deep but that he who looks up can see the light at the Valley's end."

"But is the road rough where it goes through the Valley?"

"Aye, a hard road."

"But," said the Youthful Soul, "I see none going thitherward in company. Must one travel through the Valley alone?"

"There are many who go alone," the Stranger answered. "But if any man will, I will go with him and be his guide."

"You!" cried the lad. "Do you know the way?"

The other smiled gently as he replied, "I passed through the Dark Valley long ago."

The lad bent forward: "And was it dark indeed?" he asked.

"Aye, blackness of darkness! But beyond—in the City of my Father—it is glorious!"

The Youthful Soul was troubled. "But why," he asked, "why did you pass through the Valley?"

"My Father bade me," said the Stranger, "so that I, having traveled there, might show men the way. No man comes to the Father but by me."

The lad looked at him thoughtfully, and then a flash of recognition lighted up his eyes, and with a sudden joy he laughed aloud. "I know you!" he cried. "He said I would know you. You are his Friend, and you are here on the dusty Highway, where he said I would find you!"

The Stranger smiled again. "On the dusty Highway," he agreed. "Here am I always, on the Highway, ready to lead any who will go with me through the Valley."

"Some time," said the lad, with a question in his voice, "I, too, must go? I wish I could go with you! I wish you were here always!"

"I have been here many times," said the Stranger; "but you did not know me. Often have I been by the side of your friend the carpenter. He knows me. I am come even now to go with him."

Even as he spoke, a shadow fell on the ground before the door. The carpenter stood there, dressed as for a journey. He smiled down at the lad sitting on the threshold.

"I am sent for," he said simply. "I leave my work in your hands, lad. Be you a good workman."

"Nay," cried the lad; "do not go now!"

But the carpenter shook his head. "I must go. It is better yonder. My own are waiting for me there—beyond the Dark Valley. And there is work for me there—better work. Do not hold me." For the lad had caught his horny hand and was gripping it tight. "Do not hold me."

"Are you not afraid?" asked the Youthful Soul.

"Afraid?" The man smiled across at the Stranger standing by. "Afraid? Nay; not I. Does not my Friend go with me?"

The lad glanced at the Stranger. Then his troubled eyes fixed themselves again on the carpenter's face, and he asked once more, "Are you not afraid, not the least?"

And the carpenter looked not at him but at the Stranger as he answered, "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me."

"Come," said the Stranger.

The carpenter loosed the lad's fingers from his own. "I want my Friend, dear lad," he said, "to be your Friend. He will come with you—as he goes with me. Deal kindly with the shop, lad—and with my rosebushes. Do good work—and come!"

The two turned and passed through the gate and down the Great Highway. The Youthful Soul saw them through a mist of tears; and then, as they drew away into the distance, he saw them no more.

After a time he went into the carpenter-shop, and busied himself at his work. He wet the fresh-planed plank with his tears; but still he worked. In the fall of the evening he laid down his plane and went out and stood on the dusty Highway; and he looked down the road toward the Dark Valley. Beyond the deep shadows he saw a great light, as of a land where glory shone. His heart was glad. He dried his tears.

The Golden Moments

OH, there are golden moments in men's lives,
Sudden, unlooked for, as the little clouds
All gold, which suddenly illume the gates
Of the lost sun.
Oh, pray for them! They bring
No increase, like the gains of sun and showers,
Only a moment's brightness to the earth,
Only a moment's gleam in common life,
Yet who would change them for the wealth of worlds?

"Why," you say, "one hundred cents make a dollar."

Yet, we say, that seventy-five cents can, and often does, equal a dollar.

Of course, if you were to take a dollar into a store and ask for change, you would get just one hundred cents. But if you asked to have your dollar changed into merchandise, then how much would you get?

You might get more or less than one hundred cents in merchandise. Your dollar might become the equal only of seventy-five cents, or it might become the equal of one hundred and fifty cents.

Your dollar spent in ordering from the "NATIONAL" Style Book becomes more than a dollar. Because it buys you more than a dollar's worth of actual value, compared with a dollar's worth purchased elsewhere.

Italian Ships Bombard Beirut

THOUGH there has been, during the last few weeks, considerable skirmishing between the Turks and Italians in Tripoli, no naval engagement had taken place until, on February 24, two Italian cruisers shelled and destroyed two Turkish vessels, a gunboat and a torpedo-boat, in the harbor of Beirut, Syria. The foreign shipping in the harbor immediately ran up the flags of the nations to which the vessels belonged, and, either due to good luck or the care of the Italian gunners, seems to have suffered no damage. The city of Beirut was not so fortunate. The fort joined the gunboat in answering to the Italian fire, and so drew upon itself a few large shells, which soon set it on fire and effectively silenced it. Some of the despatches state that the Turkish troops from Damascus. The attempt by a number of prisoners to escape from the local jail was frustrated by the police. Martial law has since been proclaimed.

Admiral Faravelli, in his cabled report to Rome, emphatically denied the shelling of the city. He gave a detailed account of the destruction of the Turkish vessels and of his action. His statement was that, having given the Turkish commanders three hours in which to surrender, and received no reply at the end of that time, he opened fire and destroyed them.

In Beirut, which is the most important commercial city in Syria, there is a large foreign population, most of whom are Christians, and there are thirty-eight churches of various Christian denominations in the town. The town suffered quite severely, while others claim that little damage was done. All agree that a number of noncombatants were killed, the estimates ranging all the way from ten to two hundred persons. There was a regular panic during the bombardment, and many deserted the city, flying to the Lebanon hills, while others forced an entrance to the government armory and armed themselves.

The refusal of the Moslems who plundered the arms depot to surrender the weapons aroused natural alarm in the foreign and native Christian communities, but the panic was largely allayed by the promptitude with which the vali took measures for the maintenance of order and summoned American Presbyterian Mission has been active in Beirut for nearly a century. Spread over the province are about one hundred and fifty schools connected with American missions, with many thousands of pupils. Three missionaries with their wives, one bachelor missionary and five women missionaries are engaged in the work of the society in Syria.

The Seventh Day Adventist Mission Board has four missionaries in the country, while belonging to the Syrian Protestant College in the City of Beirut, an institution generally known as the American College, there are 750 students, under the instruction of 50 professors, 30 of whom are American citizens.

The Giant "Olympic" Again in Trouble

WIRELESS dispatches which were received in Southampton, England, from Captain E. J. Smith of the White Star liner Olympic on the fifth day out from New York reported that she had broken a blade from one of her propellers in some unknown way, though it was supposed from contact with a sunken wreck somewhere about 360 miles west of the Lizard Lighthouse Station. It was thought at first that the damage was so serious that the vessel would have to proceed directly to Belfast, Ireland, to go up on the dry dock. Later reports, however, announced that she had sustained but slight damage and would proceed to her regular ports and complete the voyage under her own steam. The following day the ship was reported as safely arrived at Plymouth, England, where she discharged her passengers and freight and made ready to go to Belfast for repairs. Though it is hardly a year since this ocean giant made her first appearance she has, besides this slight accident, already suffered one which, though of no danger or consequence to the passengers, cost the owners heavily—the collision with the British cruiser Hawke in the Solent last fall.

A TESTIMONIAL IN RHYME

Miss Emily L. Hoyle, of South Willington, Conn., sends a testimonial in verse in which she says:

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD: I am late
Your kindness to appreciate.
So many obstacles befall—
Yet "better late than not at all."
Among the many presents sent
Is the "Red Letter Testament"—
A book the old or young would prize,
Just suited to old people's eyes;
And all the words our Lord hath said
Are printed here in letters red.
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has no peer—
'Tis growing better every year!
Of all the magazines I read
This is the one to take the lead.

SNIDER'S
Tomato
CATSUP

Little differences in the making produce great differences in results. Utmost care is exercised in the kind of tomatoes used for Snider's, and even in the moment of picking. They are all "home-growns." Each and every tomato that goes into Snider's Catsup must be picked when red-to-the-stem-end and must be "done into catsup" the very day it is plucked."

Think of the saving which results from using Snider's Catsup, not only as a relish — unsurpassed — for meats, hot or cold, all fish and oysters, but also as a seasoning in gravies, soups, hot tomato sauce, spaghetti, macaroni, meat pies, etc., etc.

Extreme care must be exercised to have purees and seasonings just right, and some cooks have difficulty in getting them twice the same, when the process must all be gone through each time. But Snider's Catsup saves all the time, worry and labor, while the extra fine materials used in Snider's Catsup—the seven rare and imported spices, the perfect tomatoes and the numerous other choice ingredients, some brought from far at much expense, could not be obtained at all in many kitchens. Yet they are all right at hand, blended to perfection, ever the same, in the Snider Catsup Bottle. The wise cook keeps it under her good right hand. Snider's Catsup seasons everything perfectly in a wink.

Snider Tomato Rarebit

2 tablespoons butter
2 tablespoons flour
1 cup thin cream
1-2 cup Snider's Tomato Catsup
2 cups cheese—measured after grating, or running through chopper
2 eggs slightly beaten
Salt

Melt butter in sauce pan, add flour; pour in gradually, the cream, and as soon as mixture thickens, add the catsup. Then add cheese, eggs, and salt to taste. Serve, as soon a cheese has melted, on soda crackers or crisp toast.

Happy Cozy Corner Days

AN OLD-FASHIONED GARDEN

THE garden is a lovesome thing, God wot;
Rose plot,
Fringed pool,
Ferned grot,
The veriest school of Peace;
And yet the fool
Contends that God is not in gardens.
Not in gardens! When the eve is cool!
Nay, but I have a sign.
'Tis very sure God walks in mine.

IN PLANNING a garden, plan to have plenty of the old-time, sweet-scented flowers that make into good old-fashioned nosegays. Nosegays never come from greenhouses or conservatories. No, indeed. They must be gathered at random in a garden where lady-slippers and cinnamon pinks, scarlet fuchsias, honeysuckle, tuberoses, columbines, marigold, garden lilies, ladies' smocks and foxglove are loved and cared for, or sweetbriar and branches of rosemary and lavender, with sprigs of mignonette, love-in-a-mist, sweet alyssum, heliotrope, with sprays of fragrant leaves, arranging themselves as they are cut. Ah! a nosegay made of flowers we have loved and tended ourselves is truly wonderful.

Then there are the royal red poppies, the daisies, the golden glow, asters, hollyhocks, gladioli, all strong, big, showy flowers. And, of course, the queen of every garden, the rose—damask, tea, briar, cabbage, hundred-leaf, moss, climbing, American Beauty, My Maryland, La France, and all the rest. Is this not inspiration enough for all of us to set forth with spade and trowel, and dig in the rich, good earth? Do not use up all your energy at once. Do a little each day and write me about your plans. I would dearly love to help you all along the way. I have lived all of my life in an old-fashioned garden, and it may be I could tell you many things about growing flowers successfully.

Do not attempt to raise too great a variety of flowers at first. Select eight or ten, or even twelve varieties, and make up your mind to succeed with those.

For Boys

I BELIEVE there never was a good, honest boy who did not, at some time, long to own a plot of ground where he could plant things and watch them grow. Now, I would suggest that boys plant flowers, the seeds of which are vegetables. Plant rows of scarlet runner, for example, along the garden fence. The bright red flowers are beautiful, and if allowed to go to seed, will afford delicious kidney beans for the table three or four times a week from June to frost. Parsley, mint, lettuce, cress, are beautiful and hardy. Vegetable marrow is easily raised. A bed of herbs, thyme, lavender, marjoram, sage, winter savory, fennel, tarragon is an easy bed for a boy to manage, and need not be replanted oftener than once in several years.

Next week I shall have something to say to the very little folk about gardens.

EASTER

Ere man is aware
That spring is here
The flowers have found it out.
—Old Chinese Song.

MY dear Boys and Girls: I am sure we will all agree that one of the loveliest things about the spring is that it brings us the dear Eastertime. Did you know that "Eostre" is the name of an ancient goddess of the spring worshiped by the Anglo-Saxons? Several days were set aside for her festival, which was celebrated at the same time of the calendar that we celebrate the Easter season. Which reminds me: Do you know just how to tell when Easter will be? It is quite simple, yet so many people are confused over it. Look in your almanac and find the full moon which falls upon the twenty-first day of March, or the day nearest after that. Easter will be the first Sunday after that full moon.

Christ is Risen! Alleluia!

In the olden times in heathen Europe great processions carrying branches and blossoms trailed through the spring woods, many of the people leading bulls and lambs and yearling fawns garlanded with flowering vines in honor of the return of "Eostre," and all tribes did what they could to show their delight that the spring had come again. The old heathen festival is forgotten now, and the sweet story of Christ, so rich in joy and promise, has taken its place. The Christian world, with its most wonderful festival of all the year, celebrates the resurrection of the Son of God after his death.

The world itself keeps Easter Day,
And Easter larks are singing,
And Easter flowers are blooming gay,
And Easter buds are springing;
The Lord of all things lives anew,
And all his works are rising too.

Our good-night verse is from the Song of Solomon: "Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away, for, lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth, the time of the singing of birds is come." Ever lovingly and faithfully,

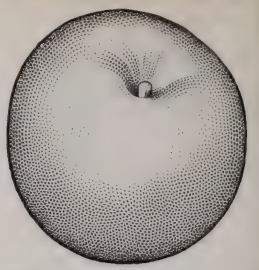
THE PERFECT APPLE



What makes a perfect apple? Pyrox makes a perfect apple by protecting fruit and foliage from codling moth and other leaf eating insects besides acting as a fungicide. It makes the fruit hang on a week or ten days longer in the Fall which gives better color, waxiness and keeping quality, giving that "finish" which brings the top market price. If you like good fruit,—use Pyrox and have it. Wise growers are ordering early. Ask the Bowker Insecticide Co., of Boston, for book on spraying.

A Talk About Worry

IT BEATS all how some folks will set down and fold their hands and worry, instead of takin' holt cheerfully of the burdens that have to be lifted. How many lions they tremble and shrink from that never prowled and roared, only through their worrisome minds! How many bridges they cross before they come to 'em—bridges built by Old Forebodin', the father of Worry, over dry waters that never raged furious only through the excited foretops of the worriers!

Marietta Holley
Author of Samantha at Coney Island

Worry never did a mite of good to any one, but only onfits us from tuss-lin' with real troubles that crouch in our way, and from buildin' a solid footbridge of hope, faith and earnest labor over wet waters that must be crossed in our life's journey.

But the Widder Trimble wuz the greatest worrier I ever see. She never seemed to enjoy herself unless she wuz miserable. She would worry for hours about the weather, and sunstrokes and such, and drouts, and about airships fallin' onto her, and tidal waves (she lived on the canal, and I told her there wuz no danger).

And she didn't know but a auto would run over her.

I told her they wouldn't, if she kep' clear on 'em.

But she didn't know but she would git kinder lost in her mind some time and run out in front of 'em.

And she would worry dretfully for fear she would marry again.

I told her there wuz no danger on't (she's grown awful humbly).

But she said men wuz so fascinatin' and persistent that she thought like as not one on 'em would git round her and marry her. I've seen her cry about it time and agin. Elam Trimble didn't treat her well, and she meant every word she said.

But how foolish it wuz for her to worry so! Time has rolled on and not a man has ever tried to make her change her mind. She writes poetry which she has printed with little vines runnin' round it at her own expense; for the editors where she has sent it, though they wanted it dretfully, they wuz so full of poetry they had to send it back onwillin'ly. But her worryin' sperit shows plain in her verses. She thinks highly of us, I've advised her so much for her good. And she writ twenty-nine verses on Josiah and sent it to us for a Christmas present. But though writ on him, he never would hear furder than the first two lines:

> What if your Josiah
> Should fall in the fire—

He flew mad as I read it and yelled out, "Duz the consarned fool think I don't know enough to keep out of the fire?"

And he started for the barn bareheaded, but though he is so bald, and zero weather, he didn't ketch cold, the top of his head, where his mind is, wuz so het up. But I read every word on't, and in spite of my remarkable reasonin' powers, I got so wrought up readin' about Josiah's turrible sufferin's, and my mournful state as his widder, that I sithed considerable, and shed a number of tears.

But how foolish it wuz in me! Josiah is alive and well to-day. And his appetite wuz never more to be depended on, when I set him down before a good meal of vittles.

But Miss Trimble would worry about the sun givin' out, and the earth freezin' up; and turnin' right round, would worry about the inside of the earth bein' afire, and spozin' the flames should bust out in her dooryard!

And when I'd git her mind offen that, she'd worry about her hens; if they didn't lay good, she thought it wuz a judgment on her; and if they laid profuse, she wuz afraid they wuz workin' too hard, and it wuz too much for 'em. And then she'd worry about sinners and sizm, and politics, and her relation, and blizzards and earthquakes and etc., etc.

But the curiousest thing! The last time I see her she wuz worryin' about not worryin'! She said "she hadn't foreboded about anything for most two days. She said it had never happened before, and she thought mebby it wuz a warnin', or else her heart wuz hardenin' like Pharo's."

But I am some in hopes that it is her head that is hardenin'. You know, heads can be so soft that good advice can't sink in and stick.

Among the Workers

—JANUARY WITNESSED the largest distribution of the Scriptures ever made in the city and harbor of New York in a single month. More than 18,000 volumes were distributed by the New York Bible Society, in thirty-six languages.

—J. B. MITCHELL, of Jellico, Tenn., a faithful mountain missionary, desires Christian books, papers, Bibles and Testaments for distribution in his evangelistic work. Any reader who wishes to send him a package should prepay expressage.

—REV. DR. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN, the famous evangelist, with Charles M. Alexander, will again make a tour of the world in evangelistic effort. On Wednesday morning, January 24, Dr. Chapman, accompanied by his wife, sailed from New York on the Cedric, White Star Line, to meet Mr. Alexander in Naples, from which place they are going direct to Australia, arriving in Melbourne March 12, and from then until May 1, 1913, will work in Australia, New Zealand and Tasmania.

—FOR THE PAST year the New York Bible Society has distributed 56,386 copies of the Scriptures, in thirty languages, to immigrants landing at Ellis Island; 14,616 volumes to sailors on vessels of all kinds; 10,505 Bibles have been placed in hotels of the city; 97 humane and criminal institutions, missions and hospitals have been supplied. Over 60,000 volumes have been distributed through pastors, missionaries and church visitors. A total of over 150,000 volumes has been circulated.

—PRINCIPAL A. M. FAIRBAIRN, who died in London recently, in his seventy-fourth year, was one of the most distinguished theologians of his day. His first ministry was in a small church in Fraserburgh, Scotland, and he afterward held pastorates in Bathgate and Aberdeen. In 1877 he became principal of the Airedale Independent College, Bradford, and in 1886 founded Mansfield College, Oxford. He was a magnificent preacher and lecturer and an able writer. He belonged to what is known as the Evangelical Union and did much to advance the influence of that denomination. Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, one of his most distinguished contemporaries, wrote of him: "He was a man of the people, and he loved the people. The formidable critic, the profound scholar, the trained thinker, was before all things a man in Christ."

—THE FEDERATED MEETINGS at Atlantic City, recently held under the leadership of Dr. Henry Ostrom, made a deep impression upon the city. The various churches of the city and their clergymen united in the movement, and there were many evidences of the divine blessing and power. One of the features of the campaign was a series of early hour home meetings held in the First Baptist Church with addresses by various clergymen and workers. Special meetings also were held for business men and for the aged. Services for mothers and their friends were held in the First Presbyterian Church on Friday, January 26. The following clergymen assisted in the success of this campaign: Herbert M. Gesner of the First Presbyterian, N. W. Cadwell of the Olivet Presbyterian, Birney S. Hudson of the First Baptist, Thomas J. Cross of the Chelsea Baptist, John McMillan of the Westminster Presbyterian, A. U. Hagerman of the First Methodist, S. G. Pitt of the Central Methodist Church.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A Ripe Old Age

WHEN Jacob stood before Pharaoh at the age of one hundred and thirty, he made a dignified address to the Egyptian king. Of the two men the old patriarch was probably the more regal, notwithstanding all that he had experienced in the course of his long life. He said, "Few and evil have been the days of the years of my life, and have not attained unto the days of the years of my fathers." Whenever we read that old story there steals over us a feeling of regret that so much bitterness had been the portion of this grandson of Abraham. Many thoughtless people criticize Jacob unfairly, forgetful of the fact that his lot was cast in days of a primitive civilization and amid strange circumstances. His mother's duplicity, in which he was accomplice, was due in part to the impression made upon her mind by prophecy at the hour of his birth.

In common with every Jewish mother through the long centuries, Rebekah hoped that through her children and children's children the Star of the Messiah should finally rise. Then, too, she had a household grievance very hard to bear. How modern and familiar is the pathetic cry which she dinned into the ears of the gentle Isaac. "I am weary of my life because of the daughters of Heth." Esau had chosen to marry among the heathen people around his home, and Jacob was sent to choose a bride from the daughters of his own people. When he said that his days had been few and evil, he may have remembered the fourteen years in which he served for his sweetheart Rachel, may have thought of her death and have recalled again the grief he had felt during the years when he believed that Joseph was dead. At all events there is a note of sadness in the old man's words, and they stand out on the sacred page as if they had been spoken this morning.

In the early history of the world, men appear to have lived for centuries. In these days of the twentieth century after Christ, days of constantly repeated miracle in the wonder world of science, we live to better purpose in one year than they did in a score of years. Tennyson in Locksley Hall exclaims: "Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay." And now that we have airships and wireless telegraphy and the chance to send night letters around the globe by telegraph at a trifling cost, now that we have the news of the nations to read at the breakfast table, and life is full of zest and fascination, a single century is worth eight or nine of the centuries dead and gone.

All this is a preamble to a little talk about longevity. Just before Christmas the death of John Bigelow removed from New York a venerable and picturesque figure. Still more, the death of this man, whose ninety-four years had been so filled with courage, patriotism and quiet fulfilment, bereaved the entire nation. Those of us whose memory harks back to the vivid and intense period of the Civil War have not forgotten all that John Bigelow did for the country in his capacity of United States minister to France. There are women among us who recall the captivating personality and gracious charm of his gifted wife, who died thirty years ago. Mr. Bigelow's secret of longevity was revealed to me several years ago in a conversation with one who was his near kinswoman. She said: "My uncle concedes nothing to Time. He goes to his desk every day, dictates to his stenographer, carries on his reading, receives his friends, and continues the round of his life without thinking at all about the number of his birthdays. He loves young people and still feels young."

This was said when Mr. Bigelow was in his last eighties. Much the same thing has lately been said in a very tender and charming book, written by a daughter of Julia Ward Howe, concerning the secret of Mrs. Howe's remarkable hold upon vigor, and the enjoyment of life to the end of her days.

One secret of longevity is in refusing to consider oneself old. Margaret Deland says pithily, "Whenever you feel too old to do a thing, do it," which is a rule worth adopting by those whose juniors are over-zealous in hedging them about with anxious and often unwelcome care.

The Note of Condescension

A PRETTY story is told in the memoir of a lady who was walking one day in an English lane, where she met a poor woman who was ill and shivering. The lady was the Marchioness of Beresford, and the woman an unknown tramp, but the lady slipped off her sealskin cloak and wrapped it around the chill form of the other. "I didn't think so much of that," said a farm boy who reported the incident. "What I did think of was that after the poor woman had been taken to a shelter and given food and medicine, my lady put on the cloak herself and wore it just the same as she did before."

There is more in the little incident than appears on the surface. Too much of our charity in this world is flawed by the note of condescension. Those who are well-to-do are kind to the poor, but they are patronizing. Much is said about bestowing alms on the worthy poor, as though the unworthy were not in the greater need. To be homeless, cold, out of work and disheartened is to walk very fast on the down-hill road. In such untoward circumstances, people drift swiftly from the haven of worthiness into the pit of unworthiness. One hears frequent criticism as to the manner in which the poor and impecunious dispose of money given them by bountiful friends. "What do you think Mrs. W—— did with the money I left there last Saturday?" The question was asked by a young woman who was the almoner of an older one. "When I tell you," she proceeded, "that I found her and her family eating saltines and canned peaches, you will not want me to give them money again in a hurry." As for saltines and canned peaches, they are certainly innocuous articles of diet, and very likely they were the first articles approaching luxury that the poor woman had seen in many a day. The trouble in much of our almsgiving is that it halts at the point of criticism, and is not tinctured with loving kindness.

Occasionally the note of condescension is struck with emphasis at precisely the wrong moment. Several years ago a woman of rare gifts, of excellent family and aristocratic traditions found herself temporarily stranded in New York. She had barely enough money in her purse to meet the needs of a single day, although she had abundant resources that later became available. She took the first work that came to her, although it was ill-paid and not the work she would have chosen. She found board and lodging in a home that was under the protection of a religious organization. Although she tarried in this place for many weeks, no one took the trouble to find her out; she came and went without a word of friendship, and when finally she was able to leave she did so without regret. She was more than the equal of women who patronized her, but they have yet to find out that they missed

What Prof. Anderson Did for Your Doctor

Professor Anderson invented Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice just to meet physicians' requirements.

He never dreamed of making food so enticing.

He made them for ease of digestion. He aimed to supply, without tax on the stomach, the nutriment of the whole grain.

Now 22,000,000 dishes a month are eaten solely because folks enjoy them. But a great many people, on physicians' directions, employ them because of their easy digestion.

Each Grain Exploded

The grains are sealed up in huge guns. Then the guns are revolved for sixty minutes in a heat of 550 degrees.

That's twice hot oven heat.

The moisture in the grain is thus converted to steam. And the steam, under pressure, permeates every particle.

When the guns are unsealed the steam explodes. Every food granule is literally blasted to pieces.

That's the whole object. Easy digestion requires this breaking of granules.

Cooking, baking and toasting break some of them. But this method alone blasts them all into atoms.

As a result, digestion begins before the grains reach the stomach.

Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c
Except in Extreme West

Now here's the other side.

The grains are puffed to eight times normal size—made four times as porous as bread. Yet the coats are unbroken.

Each grain is made up of a myriad cells, each surrounded by toasted walls.

The grains melt in the mouth because they are porous. Yet they are crisp. And they taste like toasted nuts.

They are, by all odds, the most delicious of all ready-cooked cereal foods.

How Folks Use Them

All users serve them with sugar and cream. Most users at times mix them with their dishes of fresh or canned fruits.

With bananas, for instance, Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice forms a delicious, nut-like blend.

Girls use them in candy making. Boys eat them like peanuts when at play.

But their largest use, probably, is like crackers in milk. Between meals or bedtime—whenever one is hungry—this is the ideal dish. For these foods, remember, are easy to digest.

You are missing a treat—you and the folks at your table—until you try Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice.

Extravagance in Dress

AT THE MOMENT extravagance in dress and a want of simplicity characterize too many women, young and old. As women advance in years they should wear rich materials and beautiful fabrics if they can afford the outlay. No woman after fifty, which, by the way, is not old, but only life's meridian, should ever be careless about what she wears and how she wears it. She should remember that the cut of her garments and their style is more important to her than the same thing is to her daughters and grand-daughters. An elderly woman should not be satisfied with being attractive in manner. She should be attractive in looks. She is extravagant only when she goes beyond her means and incurs obligations that she cannot conveniently meet at the call of Fashion.

Young girls do not require costly dress. Simplicity suits their years and is more becoming to their fresh complexions and bright eyes than ostentatious display. When one sees a group of young girls still in the schoolroom, who wear at an afternoon function, a birthday gathering or a little tea, dresses of silk and satin with gaudy marquisette looped over them, while silk stockings and expensive slippers of the same tint with the dress complete the costume, one has a glimpse into the folly of American mothers. In an evening affair there is apparently no limit to the profusion of ornament, including costly jewelry, which just now is lavished on the toilettes of our girls.

As for the young men, their evening dress, which at some functions is obligatory, is made to cost considerably more than it should unless they have fortunes behind them, by mufflers of price, special studs, sleeve buttons and the like. The silk hat that crowns the costume of a well-dressed youth is paid for by a goodly share of dollars, and the flowers, carriage and remaining expenses which complete an evening's bill if the man escorts a girl friend to a social function, foot up to an alarming total. What have these extravagant young folk to anticipate in the future if they require so much in the present?

A reaction set in a while ago, and in a number of our woman's colleges the essential expenses of commencement were largely abridged. The seniors announced that they would be graduated in their caps and gowns, the rich girls foregoing the former filmy white frocks and other exquisite accessories that had been part of their dream on graduation day, in the interest of the girls who had less money. We cannot overlook the fact, for it is obvious, that the strain of display falls most heavily upon people of moderate means and limited incomes, who feel compelled to keep the pace and have too much pride to appear singular when every one else around them is adorned without reference to costliness.

Vanity Fair is forever alluring us. Its streets are never shut. The people who walk therein form a bewildering pageant and their procession is endless. Why tarry in Vanity Fair? There are places where grows the little plant heart's-ease, places where the simple life still flourishes, and we may abide in them if we will. Why give our young people an outlook on life bounded by Vanity Fair?

Swedish Evangelists in Russia

EVANGELICAL Russian Christians are rejoicing in the success of the Swedish Committee of Missions in Russia, whose members are conducting successful campaigns in the land of the Czar. Much of the work is done in the face of positive danger, on account of the recent law which prohibits public gatherings except under conditions which cannot always be met. The law requires that in the locality in which the meeting is desired there shall be twenty-five adults of the same creed and faith who are personally known to the authorities and approved by the law. One of the Russian evangelists, M. N. Odintzoff, reports that within two provinces which he visited there was only one congregation with as many as twenty-five members. There were six whose membership failed to reach the number required by law. He reports: "In one place where there were converted people I succeeded in holding five secret meetings. With a little less difficulty but under threatenings of heavy punishment for violating the law I held some larger meetings with three hundred to five hundred persons, in places where I found no converted Russians."

The Rev. J. W. Wallin, a member of the committee, has recently visited Russia and sends an interesting letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in which some of the work of these evangelists is related. Mr. J. Svensson, who is in charge of the campaign in and near Moscow, reports an interesting meeting held in a factory at the request of the proprietor.

"Yesterday forenoon," he writes, "some of these preaching brethren were invited to meet Mr. Savalieff in his factory. At eleven o'clock he stopped the work in the mill and summoned all the working people into one of the halls of the factory. We sang some songs, whereupon Mr. Reimertook his text from Heb. 12 and delivered a revival sermon of great power. The interest of those present was more intense right there amongst machines, bags, candy boxes, etc., than in any church, so that one might be ready to call out: 'This is a holy place!' For Mr. Savalieff 150 working hours were lost, but he did not care about that, if only his people got an opportunity to hear God's word. Of course he had not the right to hold such a meeting, but he took his risk and held the meeting without permission. I hope it will not cause him any trouble."

In rare cases the priests of the established church encourage the meetings. One of the workers relates the following encouraging incident:

"Among the people in a meeting there is a business man, a beginner in the faith, ignorant and simple. Some time ago he came to hear us preaching for the first time and was deeply impressed. One evening he came to the home of Mr. Werbitzky for the purpose of talking about what he had heard, and went home again with peace in his soul and a new light in his eye. The son of this man goes to school but is a poor pupil with good prospects of not being approbated. Lately the priest has discovered that the boy knows just one subject better than all the other schoolboys. 'How is it that you know your religion so well when you are so stupid in all other courses?' he asked the boy. 'That is because my father teaches me at home in that subject; the others he does not know himself,' was the answer. 'And where has papa got his knowledge?' 'He visits the evangelical Christians, and they explain the Bible so. And I too used to go there with my father.' 'Ha, ha, ha!' laughed the priest. 'To the evangelic Christians! I have been there also. It is very good that you go there. And I will tell you that beyond the great hall there is another one where they have meetings for the converted. There it is still better.' In this way the priest spoke before his class. The boy came home and told his story for his parents, thereby encouraging both them and us."

Mr. Wallin, returning from his Russian tour, declares, after recognizing the discouragements: "There is one thing which gives consolation and new strength, and that is the intense hunger of the Russian people for God's word and salvation. They forget entirely their physical hunger when they get an opportunity to satisfy the hunger of the soul. They are willing to stand with open mouths like hungry birds from early morning till late in the evening listening to the tidings of God's love. Let us therefore use all our ability to save the Russian people awakening from their long sleep."

Mr. N. F. Hoyer is assisting Mr. Svensson at Moscow. Among the evangelical Christians in that city who are co-operating with Mr. Svensson and Mr. Hoyer are F. S. Savalieff, N. H. Bjalavni, T. Werbitzky, N. P. Tkatjankr and N. N. Stern.

The Folly of Paring Corns

Here's a typical corn.

Paring that corn takes off just the top layers. It merely relieves the pressure for a little time.

The root remains, and the whole corn soon returns.

And that paring is exceedingly dangerous. A slip of the blade means infection, and blood poison often results.

Ending Corns

The way to end corns is with a simple Blue-jay plaster.

The pain stops instantly. Then the B & B wax gently loosens the corn. In 48 hours the whole corn comes out.

No pain, no soreness, no inconvenience.

Over fifty million corns have been removed in this way, since this wonderful wax was invented. Every other treatment is discarded forever when a person once tries this.

For your own safety and comfort, find out what Blue-jay does.

A in the picture is the soft B & B wax. It loosens the corn.
B protects the corn, stopping the pain at once.
C wraps around the toe. It is narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive to fasten the plaster on.

My Ideal of a Car

By R. E. Olds, Designer

Reo the Fifth—My Farewell Car—in every detail marks the best I know. And I've built cars for 25 years. If any man can build a car better he's a better man than I.

To the Men Who Have Faith in Me

Automobile makers say it is simply impossible to give the best in a car for $1,055.

I agree with them.

This price, I believe, cannot be continued. Our contracts with dealers provide for advance.

But I promise you this:

Reo the Fifth, while I direct the making, will embody the best of which I am capable, regardless of price or profit.

Men Look to Me

Tens of thousands of men, in the past quarter-century, have used cars of my designing.

They have come to have faith in me. They believe that I know.

Reo the Fifth is my finest car, the cap-sheaf of my career. And myriads of men will remember me by it, whatever new cars the Reo plant may bring out.

You who look to me can rest assured that this car marks my limit.

The Final Touch

I have spent 18 months in designing this Farewell Car.

I searched the whole motor car world for ideas for it. In it I embodied the best I had learned from the 23 models which I built before it.

I never before gave such care to a car. Nor has any other man, I think.

Never have I stood for such big margins of safety—never insisted on such careful inspection.

Never before have I gone so far to get the final touch.

Look for Yourself

The lines of the car show its up-to-dateness.

The body is finished with 17 coats. The lamps are enameled. Even under the hood you'll find the engine nickel trimmed.

Note the deep upholstering, made of genuine leather, filled with genuine hair.

Note the car's roominess. Note the big wheels. The car is overtired.

Note the absence of petty economies.

The Parts Which Tell

But the parts which tell in the long run are the hidden parts of a car. Men's final judgment will depend on them.

I use Nickel Steel in the axles and driving shaft, and I make them much larger than necessary. I use Vanadium steel for connections.

Each lot of steel, to make sure of it, is analyzed before I use it.

The gears are tested in a crushing machine of 50 tons' capacity.

The magneto is tested under conditions which very few can stand.

The carburetor is doubly heated, to avoid the troubles due to low-grade gasoline.

Roller bearings are used—Timken and Hyatt—where ball bearings once sufficed. There are only three ball bearings in this whole car, and two are in the fan.

So in every part. All the precautions taught me by experience are employed in this Reo the Fifth.

New Center Control No Side Levers

Then here, for the first time, is a cane-handle control. All the gear shifting is done by slightly moving this lever in each of four directions.

Both brakes are operated by foot pedals, and one pedal also operates the clutch.

So there are no side levers—there is nothing in the way of the front doors.

This arrangement permits the left side drive, heretofore possible in electric cars only. The driver sits as he should sit, close to the cars he passes and on the up side of the road.

These are conveniences found to-day in Reo the Fifth alone.

Ask for the Book

Our Book points out all the perfections, and pictures the various bodies. Every motor car lover should have it, for this is one of the interesting cars.

Questions and Answers

A. N., Chicago, Ill. 1. How many Protestant missionaries are there in China at the present time? 2. How many different religions are there in China?

1. According to the China Mission Hand Book, there are 4,628 foreign missionaries, of whom 1,836 are men. There are also 13,675 native missionary workers laboring in 5,000 centers of population. There are about 95,000 centers destitute of missionaries or workers of any denomination. 2. The four great religions are: Confucianism, a religion of morals; Taoism, a religion of superstition; Buddhism, which is idolatry, and Anecestor Worship. Mohammedanism has 10,000,000 Chinese adherents.

Maple Leaf, Winsloe, Prince Edward Island. Will you kindly give your opinion as to whether or not the number of conversions has decreased?

There seems to be no reason at all for considering that there are fewer conversions in the work of the Protestant Church now than formerly. A statistical table prepared by Dr. H. K. Carroll for the Christian Advocate, a summary of which was given on the editorial page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for February 7, shows that the increase in the Protestant church membership for 1911 was 600,000. Of course the loss by death in the church rolls is very large, and these figures mean that besides filling up the ranks 600,000 were added. Besides this there has been a tremendous ingathering of souls through the doors of the Sunday Schools, not all of whom have as yet formally joined the church. The Methodists alone report 591,577 conversions in the Sunday Schools during the last four years. Aside from the ordinary methods of church and Sunday School work, the evangelists who are working along the old lines of revival meetings continue to have enormous success. Dr. Chapman, Gipsy Smith, Dr. Torrey, Dr. Ostrom, Billy Sunday and others have princely ingatherings in their work. To all these should be added the tremendous victories of the church in the mission field.

K. W., Holbrook, Pa. Is it wrong to call the communion service or Lord's Supper an ordinance?

Baptism and the Lord's Supper are both ordinances of the Gospel in the highest sense, being established by divine authority. See Matt. 28: 19 and Luke 22: 19.

Reader, Monticello, N. Y. In a discussion on child labor the point was raised that it is a good thing to teach a child to work early, and a mistake to hold any child back from honest work too long. Is this the correct view?

In one sense, it is the right view. But the exploiting of child labor has resulted in child slavery on such a large scale in the mines, the mills, the factories, the sweat-shops, etc., that it has become a serious national problem. The State provides education for the child, but the little ones are too often deprived not only of educational privileges but of all the innocent recreations of childhood, and their bodies and minds are stunted and impaired. Healthful labor suited to boys and girls would not be opposed, but when health and school training are systematically sacrificed it is time to interfere. There are many things which, while good in moderation, become a positive evil when abused, and when parents cannot or will not protect the child, the State should undertake the work of protection.

Interested Reader, West Roxbury, Mass. 1. Do the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church receive calls to their several churches, or does the conference send them to the churches without regard to calls? 2. What is the Unitarian belief or creed? Is this denomination very large, and if so in what States and country has it the greater number of adherents? 3. How could one best plan to get young boys or girls of 13 or 14 to decide for Christ? They usually believe that they are already Christians since they have always had Christian training.

1. The ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church are frequently called to serve in churches, but the desire of the church or the minister is subject to the command of the bishop. The appointments are made at the annual conference by the bishop, in consultation with the district superintendents, after considering the wishes of the various ministers and churches. 2. The Unitarian creed is that there is only one person in the Godhead instead of three as held by the orthodox or trinitarian churches. There are many different degrees and phases of Unitarianism, but its most serious danger and error is the failure to acknowledge the absolute deity of Jesus Christ. The denomination is strongest in the New England States; it has almost no standing in any other country than the United States. 3. It is undoubtedly true that some children brought up in Christian homes never consciously wander away from God, so as to require a definite experience of conversion. These cases, however, are rare. The ordinary child, if told frankly about the desire of God for his warm affection and perfect obedience, can be made to feel that many of the things he has done are so wrong as to need a positive forgiveness. Any boy or girl who will ask for pardon and a clean heart can receive these gifts from God in the same way and with the same clearness that they come to older people.

Several Readers. Many requests come to us for old hymns, some line or lines of which linger in the mind. The large assortment of hymn-books in our library is carefully studied in the interest of these inquirers, but very many of these lines cannot be placed. A correspondent has explained the difficulty which we have experienced. He says that the old hymns are so mutilated and altered by the modern psalter-makers that the best part of them is often lost. For the sake of smoothness and euphony, the strength and flavor of the old hymns are too often shorn away. In some of the newer versions, except for an occasional striking line which has been preserved, the old hymns are hardly recognizable. One correspondent mentions as a flagrant case that of the famous hymn beginning "Jerusalem, my happy home." One of its most famous stanzas runs:

Reach down, O Lord, thine arm of grace
And cause me to ascend,
Where congregations ne'er break up,
And Sabbaths never end.

Another is:

When we've been there ten thousand years,
Bright shining as the sun,
We've no less days to sing God's praise
Than when we first begun.

These quaint old lines are omitted from most of the modern versions, with many others now lost. They may be found in the old hymn-books of half a century ago.

J. C. R., Selma, Ala. 1. Where did the word "rube" or "rubes" originate? 2. To whom is the phrase "54-40 or fight" to be credited?

1. The word "rube" is applied humorously to men living in the country, and doubtless came from the fact that Reuben was a favorite name with old-fashioned families, who liked to select names from the Old Testament for their children. 2. The expression "54-40 or fight" came into public use about 1835. It was in reference to the controversy between Great Britain and the United States as to the Canadian border, certain enthusiastic Americans contending that the line should be fixed at this latitude, even at the cost of war. It is probably not known what individuals first made use of the slogan.

Reader, Scranton, Pa. 1. We are not to criticize others, nor to judge them. Both the churches you mention have the Gospel, and know it. Both claim to be Christian, and if they do not proclaim the Gospel faithfully, they will be held to account. We do not question the accuracy of your observations, however. 2. "Freak" and "monstrosity" should not be used interchangeably, although both are often applied to the same thing. "Freak" is a caprice, a whim, a vagary of nature or of the mind, and may be pleasant or the reverse. "Monstrosity" is something unnaturally huge, distorted or terrible.

M. J. S., Brooklyn, N. Y. Will you please explain the meaning of peonage?

Peonage is a system of payment of debt which obtains in parts of Spanish America. A peon is a laborer or servant who is bound to serve his creditor at a very small cash wage until his debt is discharged. Many of the employers have introduced abuses into the system until it is next to impossible for the peon to free himself of debt and so become able to choose his own employment. The system has led to the establishment of what is practically slavery in all but name. Many of the more progressive Central and South American nations have passed laws forbidding this practice, but it is very difficult to enforce them and cases of violations are continually docketed for trial and settlement.

J. T., Ashland, Neb. I like THE MAIL-BAG. I would like to say to Mrs. J. B. H., of Ontario, Canada, that if she will read carefully Paul's letter to the Hebrews, she will find that he is endeavoring to convince the Jews that Christ is our high-priest and through him we have access to God (read Heb. 6: 17-19). In Hebrews, 7th chapter, he speaks of Melchisedec, who was a real man, the king of Salem. Salem means peace or righteousness (that is, Jebus Salem or Jerusalem). Paul is speaking of their priesthood and not their personage. Melchisedec's priesthood was not inherited; neither did it descend to his son, but he took the office with him forever. Just so with that of Christ; it was not an inheritance. Read carefully Heb. 7: 12: 21. So Paul would teach the Jews that Christ, though not of the tribe of Levi, was a priest after the order of Melchisedec, whose priesthood Abraham acknowledged and to whom he paid tithes. With the Levitical priesthood, when the priest died, another man was baptized "for the dead" into the office (I. Cor. 15: 29), so the priesthood was passed on from generation to generation.

A. S., Washington, D. C. Were there fourteen apostles? In Acts 1: 26 we read that Matthias was chosen an apostle to fill the place formerly occupied by Judas. This action must have been taken very soon after the ascension of Christ. Two or three years after this vacancy was filled, Saul started on his trip to Damascus, and was converted on the way, and no Christian seems to doubt as to his being an apostle afterward; but was he ever so appointed or elected by the other apostles?

There were originally twelve apostles or disciples. After the treachery of Judas, Matthias was appointed in his place. (See Acts 1: 7-26.) Next Saul was miraculously added (see Acts 9: 15-17; Acts 26: 16; I. Tim. 1: 12 and 2: 7 and II. Tim. 1: 11), thus making the complete number fourteen. It is clear from the 9th chapter of Acts, that Paul was so accepted and recognized by the rest of the apostolic band.

I. S., Madeline, N. Y. What is the "marriage of the Lamb"? (Rev. 19: 7.)

In this chapter, the word "marriage" is used as a symbol of the perfect union between Christ and his Church—a union in which all will share in the holiness, joy and glory of his Kingdom. The transfigured, translated and risen Church is symbolized as a bride, which, with Christ the Bridegroom, shall reign over the earth and the nations thereof. The bride will be the mother Church of the material earth, which has been Christianized through her. Individually, believers are guests at the marriage supper; but collectively, they represent the bride in the symbolism of Revelation, belonging exclusively to Christ. The similitude is further carried out in the description of the bride's array in verse 8 and is explained in the clause "for the fine linen is the righteousness of the saints." The marriage supper" or feast celebrative of this union is typified by the Lord's Supper here on earth (see Matt. 26: 29).

Mrs. J. F. D., Paces, Va. I desire to learn and know more of the Bible. Could I learn it quicker from books than I could from reading the Bible itself?

There are many excellent helps to Bible study and the books mentioned in your letter will probably be found of this class. We would advise you, however, to get the following: a reference Bible, teachers' edition, with helps attached, a concordance, a Bible dictionary, a good commentary (Jameson, Faussett & Brown's preferably), and lastly, the historical works of Josephus. With these at hand, for ready reference, you will be able to command the aid of the best available scholarship. If you can only afford one book besides the Bible, select the commentary. You can then go through the Bible book by book, reading the commentary to assist you as you proceed.

E. E. P., Buffalo, N. Y. In a MAIL-BAG paragraph you state that "healing by prayer was a special privilege of the early apostolic church." Surely the prayer of faith and understanding is as potent to-day as it was 1,900 years ago.

The whole question is one of faith. God's power is not shortened, and that he is ever ready to hear and answer the prayer of faith as true to-day as it was in apostolic times. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD receives positive demonstration of this fact in letters from its readers every week, acknowledging answers to prayer. In the MAIL-BAG paragraph referred to (see issue of February 14) we stated distinctly that "some churches hold this gift to have been transmitted to the present time." If the great body of professing Christians measured up to the right standard of faith in God, and the churches would acknowledge and enjoy the gift.

L. F., Los Angeles, Calif. 1. Do the following passages of Scripture substantiate the ultimate salvation of the entire human race, and are there any other passages or indications from which logical conclusions can be drawn that in the future world there will be a chance to accept Christ? I. Cor. 3: 13-15, and 15: 22-26; Rom. 5: 18 and 8: 19-21; I. Tim. 2: 4-6; I. Pet. 3: 18-20. 2. Is it proper to assume that God as the Creator of all mankind will not abandon his creation and leave them to utter destruction, but will find a way eventually to save all?

1. The eleventh verse of the first-named passage gives the foundation, which is faith in Jesus Christ alone. Man's work is the superstructure we lay upon that foundation, and if the work "abides" the test, it is well and will bring a special reward for the worker; if not, though the work must perish, though he himself be saved through faith. Thus salvation in the ultimate is dependent upon faith in Christ. There is no warrant here for salvation for those who have not built upon faith as the foundation. Chapter 15: 22, 23 clearly expresses this limitation—"they are Christ's" (see Col. 1: 14 and I. Thess. 4: 16). Rom. 5: 18 must be read in conjunction with the three following verses. The gift of eternal life is open to all who will accept it through faith unto justification. The passage from I. Peter concerning the "spirits in prison" has repeatedly been discussed in THE MAIL-BAG. All the Gospels show that faith in and acceptance of Christ are the first essentials. 2. We cannot go beyond what Scripture reveals. God is just as well as merciful. The passages you cite are frequently quoted by Universalists in support of their doctrine; but Scripture proves that the whole plan of salvation depends upon its voluntary acceptance or rejection by men individually. The punishment of the impenitent is so clearly taught in many passages that it cannot be gainsaid.

Esther R., New York, N. Y. If Jesus was God's Son why was he not born in a palace rather than a stable?

This seems to be a reverent inquiry made by one who is not familiar with the peculiar principles and ideals of Christianity. It was to meet just such honest questions that the great Epistle to the Hebrews was written, showing the glory of the spiritual magnificence of Christianity to be greater than the glory of pomp and ritual. According to the ideals of Christianity it is no disgrace for a real king to be born in a stable. The greatest king is the king who will serve his subjects in the greatest humility. And this was Jesus. Dr. C. W. Barnes, writing for the Methodist Review, says: "All that Jesus asked of the world was a cross whereon to die." Gold and jewels and royal robes meant nothing to him. From the manger to the cross he showed men that the real glory is the glory of sacrifice; that true riches are the riches of service and love; that the jewels which endure are the jewels of purity and humility and devotion.

Miscellaneous

E. E. B., Evart, Mich. Chauffeur is pronounced sho-fur, and Peloubet, pay-loo-bet, accent on second syllable.

Mrs. T. L. G., Booneville, Ky. There is no such passage in the Bible as your letter quotes. You probably refer to the passage in Josh. 10: 12, 13, which is a poetical apostrophe from the Book of Jasher.

Mrs. J. E., Olympia, Wis. The better translation is "suffer us not to be led into temptation." We are distinctly told that "God tempteth no man," although he may, by the withdrawal of the Holy Spirit, permit man to be tempted.

M. E. S., New London, Conn. It is probable that immersion was very generally practiced by the early Christians in baptism. The discussion is an old one. God looks at the heart and the purpose more than at the form of the ceremonial. Send full name and address for answer to your other question.

J. McG., Brooklyn, N. Y. We judge and condemn no one who is teaching the doctrines of Christianity in sincerity and according to his best lights. Where Christ and his atonement are not duly recognized, and where the human will is substituted for the divine will, the doctrine is other than Christian. Jesus himself warned his people against misleading teachers.

N. G., Farmville, Va. Marriage to the daughter of a wife is among the proscribed relationships in Scripture. The marriage law in Israel was properly guarded by restrictions, in order to protect the honor and the rights of womanhood and to elevate domestic and social morals.

A farmer in North Dakota needs help to tide him over a very serious crisis. Any reader who may be interested will learn name and address by dropping a postal to "Farmer," care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The case is worthy and all inquiries can be satisfactorily answered.

O. Y. K., Germantown, Neb. 1. See the statistics of religious progress on page 128, issue of February 7. 2. The dream of an American Pope, if it be indeed indulged by Catholics, is a delusive one. The whole spirit of the American people is opposed to church domination. 3. The ammunition story you mention is doubtless pure sensation.

E. G., Roxbury, Mass. The Pauline books are so well known to Bible readers that there is no difficulty in recognizing them, and no need for a reclassification of the present arrangement. Perhaps, however, for the purpose of Bible study, if these Epistles were taken together as a whole, it might be an advantage, as you suggest.

W. T. D., Siler City, N. C. 1. Christ taught that all men are brothers, and nothing he uttered justified the persecution of any race or people on account of color. 2. Lynching is a lawless return to savagery. No one who claims to be a Christian can approve of it. 3. In law as in religion, all men should stand equal, and the estimate of a man should be based upon his intelligence, his moral character and his value as a citizen, and not upon the color of his skin.

The Only Complete

Bible Library

EVER PREPARED FOR POPULAR USE

Palm Trees and Pyramids seen by Joseph and Mary when they fled with the Christ-Child into Egypt to escape Herod's Cruel Law

EVERY one knows that the Bible is the most interesting and fascinating book ever written. But in order to fully appreciate its wonderful charm and its wealth of hidden beauty, it is necessary to know more about the Holy Land and its people, to have the benefit of authoritative comments upon the text and some simple method of easily and quickly locating the different incidents and thrilling events of Bible history. There are many books based upon the Bible and Bible history, it is true, but the use of such a collection of books requires so much skill and labor in referring from one book to another as to make it impracticable for ordinary use. Realizing the great need for a simple yet complete and combined "Biblical library" at a price within the reach of all, the Society has prepared and now offers the

It makes reading the Bible a pleasure and a delight and opens up a world of beauty and interest that has been almost ,meaningless to the average reader. Edited by Bishop John H. Vincent. Indorsed by Bishop D. G. Tuttle, Rev. Frank W. Gunsaulus, Gipsy Smith and leading ministers of all Protestant denominations.

The 448 Actual Photographs

REALIZING how much easier it would be to appreciate the Bible if every one could visit the Holy Lands and see for themselves the places and scenes of Bible history, the Society equipped a special Expedition at a cost of $25,000 to tour Bible Lands and to secure actual photographs of all the places made sacred by the footsteps of Christ and the great events of Bible history. The result is a truly priceless collection of 448 wonderful 7-in. by 10-in. Biblical and Historical photographs, by means of which the Society now brings Bible Lands to us in our own homes.

MAN'S STRUGGLE FOR EFFICIENCY

INTERESTING METHODS HE IS USING TO MAKE AND KEEP HIM ENERGETIC AND CAPABLE

BY WALTER GRIFFITH

Perhaps the most interesting phase of the present-day struggle to realize our ambitions in whatever direction they may lie, and one indeed on which it were well for everyone to be informed, is the different methods adopted by Americans, both men and women, to keep themselves physically fit to stand the strain of keeping constantly up to "concert pitch."

They are not by any means always adopted until Nature has cried quits and the subject is struggling to recover his efficiency, but whenever employed they are well worthy a study and ofttimes ludicrous to the looker-on, though perhaps not to the performer.

If you were to arise at six o'clock some fine morning and visit Central Park and Riverside Drive, New York, you would be amused by viewing, among a number of others, some stout gentleman who looks very dignified after nine A. M.; now, however, he is on a horse (part of the time), or even running on foot, and looks hot, uncomfortable and funny. This is a consistent practice at the present time of many New York business men, as well as those of other cities.

In convenient proximity to several large cities there are Health Institutions that could perhaps be aptly called "Training Institutions." Those who visit there are placed in the hands of a veritable "Trainer" who runs them, rides them, trots them, exercises them, and supervises their diet. They are under strict discipline which does not always set well, but accomplishes what they are there for—puts them in good physical condition.

There are many gymnasiums and physical culture schools located in convenient places in the large cities where an opportune hour a day is taken in giving the body its much needed exercise.

Osteopathic Treatment might be termed, in a way, "exercise without effort," or, better still, "involuntary exercise," for certainly the manipulation exercises the subject though not of his own volition.

Many and diverse kinds of massages, Swedish, German, etc., combined Diet and Exercise, Sour and Sterilized Milk Treatments, Raw Wheat, Fruit and Nut Diets, etc., are being liberally patronized to the end that men and women, under our present mode of living (which is hardly natural) may maintain or even increase their capacity for strenuous effort with its attendant reward.

All of these methods have their advantages—some undoubtedly greater than others—I am not competent to choose.

But mark this:

Every one of them that is effective, has for its primary purpose and ultimate result the elimination of waste from the system.

This can not help being the fact, for the initial cause of probably 90 per cent. of man's inefficiency is the inability of the system, under our present mode of living, to throw off the waste which it accumulates.

The result is a partial clogging of the colon (large intestine) which is the direct cause of sluggish livers, biliousness, slight or severe headaches—and with these, or any one of them, comes inability to work, think or perform up to our usual standard.

That eminent scientist, Professor Metchnikoff, states unqualifiedly that the poison generated in the colon is the chief cause of our comparatively premature old age.

Now if these exercises or diets were entirely successful in eliminating this waste from the colon, they would be, with their strengthening and upbuilding properties, wonderfully resultful—but they do not and can not.

One might as well chop a tree down from the top, or try to pump a lake dry by starting at one of the brooks that feed it.

When you are ill, and a physician is called, the first thing he does is to purge the system—Why—first because the waste has to be disposed of before any medicine will take effect—second, because if there was no waste, you probably would not have been ill at all.

Also remember that healthy blood will destroy almost any germ that is known to science, but unhealthy or contaminated blood welcomes them with open arms and says, "Come and feed and multiply."

Our blood can not be healthy unless our colons are kept pure and clean; the blood is constantly circulating through the colon and will immediately take up by absorption the poisons of the waste which it contains, distributing it throughout the entire system.

That's the reason that biliousness and its kindred complaints make us ill "all over." It is also the reason that if this waste is permitted to remain a little too long the destructive germs, which are always present in the blood, gain the upper hand and we become not only inefficient, but really ill—seriously sometimes if there is a weak spot.

This accumulated waste is the direct, immediate, specific cause of appendicitis, for instance.

Now the first help that we have been calling to our aid when this waste becomes unbearable, or lays us out, is Drugs. These have some effect, but there are a few vital reasons why they should not and need not be used.

Drugs are violent in their action and convulse and sap the vitality of other functions before they reach the colon. The colon is the last spot they reach, therefore it is impossible for them to clean it thoroughly—and last, but not least, the using of Drugs for this purpose must be persisted in—making one a slave to them and constantly weakening parts of the body that should not be touched at all.

So great an authority as Prof. Alonzo Clark, M. D., of the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons, says: "All of our curative agents are poisons and as a consequence every dose diminishes the patient's vitality."

No, none of these are necessary or effective for the specific purpose of defeating this greatest of all foes to man's efficiency, for Nature herself has provided a means which, if applied in the proper way, will, without any evil effect or inconvenience whatever, keep the colon sweet, pure, clean, and healthy.

That "Nature Way" is Internal Bathing with warm water properly applied; but it must be properly applied to be effective.

It would perhaps be interesting to note the opinions of a Physician, an Osteopath and a Physical Culturist on this subject:

"The results that I have had from the use of the Internal Bath in my own family are marvelous." Geo. H. Davis, M. D., Springfield, Mass.

"I have two Internal Baths, one for myself and one for a patient. I am an Osteopath, and find in connection with my work that it does wonders." G. L. Bowdy, D. O., Denver, Col.

"I find the Internal Bath of immense benefit to me. I look upon it as an absolute necessity to the attainment of perfect physical development, and think every person, especially those engaged in physical culture, ought to use it." Anthony Barker, Professor of Physical Culture, New York.

A New York physician of many years' practical experience and observance of the colon and its influence on the general health, has made a special study of Internal Bathing, and has written an interesting and exhaustive book on the subject called, "Why Man of To-day Is Only 50% Efficient."

This he will send without cost or other obligation to anyone addressing, Charles A. Tyrrell, M. D., 134 West Sixty-fifth Street, New York City, and mentioning that he read this in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

It is surprising how little the great majority of people know about this particular part of their make-up; and inasmuch as it plays so important a part in the general health and the maintaining of 100 per cent. of efficiency it seems as though every one should at least enlighten himself by reading this little treatise on the subject, by one who has made it his life's study and work.—Advertisement.

IN LONE GETHSEMANE

WHEN to Gethsemane He went—
All shadow-dimmed with deep portent—
Though He was very God of God,
His human heart shrank from the rod.
Then sought He human sympathy
In His beloved, chosen three:
But slumbered they and gave no heed
The Master in His sorest need.

And never yet has human heart
Felt to the full the ache and smart;
The anguish dumb that holds in clutch
The one that's closest to its touch.
In vain we seek to share our grief;
Each heart must find its own relief.
Still each sad soul must lonely be Within its own Gethsemane.

Yet One kept watch there with the Christ
Though human hearts forgot their tryst;
Lest flesh should fail, and faith wax dim,
An angel came and strengthened Him.
And sure, O heart, am I of this—
A foretaste of the Heavenly bliss—
For you there's angel ministry
Within your lone Gethsemane!

Perry, N. Y. ALICE J. NICHOLS.

Is Gold Impoverishing the World?

TO THE great mass of intelligent people it would seem paradoxical to make the assertion that the civilized world of commerce and business is being made poor by a deluge of gold. Yet this is the view taken by some leading journals here and abroad, as indicating the true cause of the high prices and the recent extraordinary increase in the cost of living. It is a fixed principle in the great world of production that the value of an article rises or falls according as the article is scarce or abundant. Just in this way, the New York Mail points out, does the gold inflation magnify prices and reduce the purchasing power of incomes generally. Wage-earner, merchant, property-owner, capitalist—all except a few of the very wealthy—feel the strain of depleted money values, and the proportionate increase in the cost of foodstuffs, clothing and general commodities. The Mail says: "The London Statist has shown that the gold holdings of the chief central banks of the world, and treasuries which act as central banks, had increased from about $2,500,000,000 in December, 1900, to about $4,500,000,000 in December, 1910—an increase of over 77 per cent. Who benefited by this increase of gold? Certainly not those whose income is a fixed, or an approximately fixed, sum. As a matter of fact, about ninety-nine persons out of a hundred were injuriously affected by it, for the purchasing power of their money was greatly lessened. And it is apparent that the inflation must go on! According to a writer in the Nineteenth Century and After, it has been proved that there are over $10,000,000,000 of unmined gold in the Witwatersrand of South Africa alone, and there is a vast deal of gold in other parts of the Transvaal; and Rhodesia, Australia, Central Asia and Alaska have only been scratched for gold. It is certain that during the next ten years at least $5,000,000,000 of new gold will be let loose in the world. What will be the result? It behooves the representatives of the people to look into these questions, in a spirit of honest and unprejudiced inquiry, and see why it is that God's gift of untold new wealth to the world only serves to make people poorer."

World's Highest R. R. Station

THE site of the highest railway station in the world was pierced recently at Jungfrau-Joch, 11,400 feet above the sea. The tunnel of the famous Jungfrau Railway emerges here right among the glaciers. The construction of this railway has penetrated Mounts Eiger and Monch. An observation house will be built on the ridge by the terminal station, commanding a wonderful view of the entire Bernese Oberland, with the city of Interlaken nestling in the valley below.

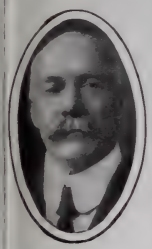
Getting the Most Out of Books

BY DR. O. S. MARDEN

WHAT you get out of a book is not necessarily what the author puts into it, but what you bring to it. If the heart does not lead the head, if the thirst for knowledge, the hunger for a broader and deeper culture, are not the motives for reading, you will not get the most out of a book. But if your thirsty soul drinks in the writer's thoughts as the parched soil absorbs rain, then your latent possibilities and the potency of your being, like delayed germs and seeds in the soil, will spring forth into new life.



Dr. O. S. Marden

When you read, read as Macaulay did, as Carlyle did, as Lincoln did—as did every great man who has profited by his reading—with your whole soul absorbed in what you read, with such intense concentration that you will be oblivious of everything else outside of your book.

In order to get the most out of books, the reader must be a thinker. The mere acquisition of facts is not the acquisition of power. To fill the mind with knowledge that cannot be made available is like filling our houses with furniture and bric-à-brac until we have no room to move about.

Many people have an idea that if they keep reading everlastingly, if they have a book in their hands during every leisure moment, they will, of necessity, become full-rounded and well-educated. This is a mistake. They might just as well expect to become athletes by eating at every opportunity. It is even more necessary to think than to read. Thinking, contemplating what we have read, is what digestion and assimilation are to the food.

I know a young man who has formed such a habit of reading that he is hardly ever without a book, a magazine, or a paper. He is always reading, at home, on the cars, at the railway stations, and he has acquired a vast amount of knowledge. He has a perfect passion for knowledge, and yet his mind seems to have been weakened by his perpetual brain stuffing.

You should bring your mind to the reading of a book, or to the study of any subject, as you take an ax to the grindstone; not for what you get from the stone, but for the sharpening of the ax.

The greatest advantage of books does not always come under what we remember of them, but from their suggestiveness, their character-building power.

"It is not in the library, but in yourself," says Fr. Gregory, "in your self-respect and your consciousness of duty nobly done—that you are to find the 'Fountain of Youth,' the 'Elixir of Life,' and all the other things that tend to preserve life's freshness and bloom. It is a grand thing to read a good book—it is a grander thing to live a good life—and in the living of such life is generated the power that defies age and its decadence."

No one better illustrates what books will do for a man, and what a thinker will do with his books, than Gladstone, who was always far greater than his career. He rose above Parliament, reached out beyond politics, and was always growing. He had a passion for intellectual expansion. His peculiar gifts undoubtedly fitted him for the church, or he would have made a good professor at Oxford or Cambridge, but circumstances led him into the political arena, and he adapted himself readily to his environment. He was an all-round well-read man, who thought his way through libraries and through life.

If a person is discouraged or depressed by any great bereavement or suffering, the quickest and the most effective way of restoring the mind to its perfect balance, to its normal condition, is to immerse it in a sane atmosphere, an uplifting, encouraging, inspiring atmosphere, and the most good in the world is found in the best books. I have known people who were suffering the keenest, most painful mental anguish, from losses and shocks which almost unbalanced their minds, to be completely revolutionized in their mental state by the suggestive power which came from becoming absorbed in a great book.

Everywhere we see rich old men sitting around the clubs, smoking, looking out of the windows, lounging around hotels, traveling about, uneasy, dissatisfied, not knowing what to do with themselves, because they had never prepared for this part of their lives. They put all their energy, ambition, everything into their vocation.

I know an old gentleman who has been an exceedingly active business man. He has kept his finger upon the pulse of events. He has known what has been going on in the world during his whole active career. And he is now as happy and as contented as a child in his retirement, because he has always been a great reader, a great lover of his kind.

People who keep their minds bent in one direction too long at a time soon lose their elasticity, their mental vigor, freshness, spontaneity.

The lover of good books can never be very lonely; and, no matter where he is, he can always find pleasant and profitable occupation and the best of society when he quits work.

We may call up the greatest writer in the middle of the night when we cannot sleep, and he is just as glad to see us as at any other time. We are not excluded from any nook or corner in the great literary world; we can visit the most celebrated people that ever lived without an appointment, without influence, without the necessity of dressing or of observing any rules of etiquette. We can drop in upon a Milton, a Shakespeare, an Emerson, a Longfellow, a Whittier without a moment's notice and receive the warmest welcome.

It is only when books have been read and reread with ever deepening delight that they are clasped to the heart, and become what Macaulay found them to be, the old friends who are never found with new faces, who are the same to us in our wealth and in our poverty, in our glory and in our obscurity. No one gets into the inmost heart of a beautiful poem, a great history, a book of delicate humor, or a volume of exquisite essays, by reading it once or twice. He must have its precious thoughts and illustrations stored in the treasure-house of memory, and brood over them in the hours of leisure.

"No matter how poor I am," says William Ellery Channing, "no matter though the prosperous of my own time will not enter my obscure dwelling; if the sacred writers will enter and take up their abode under my roof — if Milton will cross my threshold to sing to me of Paradise; and Shakespeare to open to me the worlds of imagination and the workings of the human heart—I shall not pine for want of intellectual companionship, though excluded from what is called the best society in the place where I live."

A BEAUTIFUL GIFT

MRS. H. P. WOOLSEY, Kingman, Kan., writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "I am sending you enclosed my yearly donation of $5 for your good work and also a small box with a few pieces of silver (coins) and other small change, $3.25, which my dear husband had picked up in the street at different times and saved, intending to put to some good use. He is now dead and I know of no better use to put them to than to send them to you to feed the hungry." This beautiful gift will be applied to the feeding of the men and lads of the Bowery Mission Bread-Line. The giver will have as her guests, fed by her bounty, 330 of the destitute and homeless unemployed.

NERO AT THE CIRCUS

NERO! The very sound of the name pictures tyranny and cruelty. Born of a murderess and schooled in crime by murderers, the life of this man has stood thru all ages as the climax of cruelty and crime. How the Christian martyrs were persecuted and tortured by the tyrant, how he recklessly defied all precedent and created tortures and crimes unheard of before, and how his selfish, childish weakness, at last brought him to a coward's grave, is all told vividly and masterfully in the Library of Universal History. The illustration of the tyrant at the Circus is only one of the hundreds which embellish this great work.

Solving the Egg Problem

BY A. F. HUNTER

A SMALL space in the back yard, a bit of ground eight feet square, is all the room that is necessary for keeping a family flock of a dozen fowls; they need never go out of the house until we kill them for eating on the family table, or sell them alive to the marketman when the schools have closed for the long vacation and the family goes away to the country for the summer.

A house eight feet square on the ground has sixty-four square feet of floor space, sufficient room for a dozen full-grown pullets of any of the American breeds (the Plymouth Rocks, Wyandottes or Rhode Island Reds), or the same space will keep fifteen Leghorns. The Americans lay brown or tinted eggs, which are much preferred by many people; the Leghorns lay white eggs; if poultry meat for the Sunday dinner is also a consideration one of the American breeds should be chosen, as the Leghorns are decidedly small of size.

When poultry is kept for breeding purposes as well as eggs for the family there should be an outside run for them, and there must be a male bird also. Where eggs for the family table is the end and aim there is no need of an outside run; then we avoid the unsightly litter of the chicken yard and there are no feathers flying about the neighborhood. When an outside run is given the birds, four square feet of floor space each in the house is ample; when the birds are kept within the house all the time five square feet each of floor space is better.

The plan contemplates eating most of the birds, beginning say the last of March (when eggs are very plenty and cheap), and eating two a month till the schools close and the family goes away to the country for the summer vacation; all that are left at that time should be sold to the butcher or the hen-cart man, to be dressed for market. A new flock of ready-to-lay pullets is bought in the early fall. If the right kind of pullets is bought and they are fed and cared for aright there will be an abundance of fresh-laid eggs for the family, and experience proves that there usually is a surplus to sell to a less fortunate neighbor.

The kind of pullets to buy is important. True, we are likely to buy those which are nearest to our hand—we follow the line of least resistance! Pullets of the American breeds that are about beginning to lay the last of September or first of October can be bought for about $1.50 apiece; Leghorn pullets that are fully grown at that time will cost about $1 apiece. The Americans lay brown or tinted eggs, and will lay quite as many eggs in a year as Leghorns; being about twice as large as the latter they are worth fully twice as much for eating. That eating value should be kept in mind when making a purchase. Don't buy half-grown pullets, even if they are offered you at less than half the price of full-grown ones. The half-grown birds are overtaken by cold weather, and the remainder of their development is aggravatingly slow. They go well into if not half through the winter before getting ready for business. In buying pullets, as in so many other things, the best is the cheapest in the end; if we buy good, well-grown pullets the first of October bringing them forward to egg-production is a simple and easy proposition.

A good house for a family flock of fowls can be bought at any poultry supplies store, and at moderate cost, lumber and labor considered. True, a good home-built house, made of lumber from packing-cases, etc., can be built at very small cost, but the home-built house is likely to be somewhat unsightly, because more or less "cobbled" together. An attractive, well-constructed house is more pleasing to the 15,000 Physicians Approve when you take Sanatogen

—approve by their written endorsement of this remarkably successful food-tonic.

The opinions of this splendid body of practising physicians have followed actual test of Sanatogen, and such a mass of opinion has a weight that may well give confidence to every one who turns to Sanatogen for help.

HELP—not magic, not makeshift, not stimulant—real help to an exhausted nervous system—that is the "secret" of Sanatogen, that is the basis of the enthusiastic approval of medical men who know that nerves to be helped must be fed.

Nerves have their own hunger, and their hunger brings the rebellion that disturbs the balance of health. Every function of the body feels the depression and disturbance—sleep, digestion, mental efficiency, all are affected, and reaction aggravates the trouble. The one practical answer to this nerve hunger is food, a specific food that will give to the nerves the nourishment they have failed to gather from the daily food of the body.

Sanatogen's scientifically combined elements of nerve strength, purest albumen and glycero-phosphate of sodium, go straight to the points of weakness. They restore the losses and in that way rebuild and revitalize the system. They cheer and invigorate by the logical natural means of meeting the demand. If you will try Sanatogen you will find that this multitude of physicians and the wide groups of famous men and women who have written of it so enthusiastically have but spoken for a universal need of the human system.

This Remarkable Book FREE

We ask you earnestly to get acquainted with Sanatogen. Investigate our claims first, if you like, and we are only too glad to have you do so. Ask your doctor about it, and in any case write at once for our book, "Our Nerves of Tomorrow," the work of a physician-author, written in an absorbingly interesting style, beautifully illustrated and containing facts and information of vital interest to you. This book also contains evidence of the value of Sanatogen which is as remarkable as it is conclusive.

Sanatogen is sold in three sizes, $1.00, $1.90, $3.60

Get Sanatogen from your druggist—if not obtainable from him, sent upon receipt of price.

eye, and we shall be more likely to take good care of it and of its inhabitants if it is a good house; another substantial advantage is that these ready-made houses are portable, are easily taken apart and may be moved just as a piece of furniture.

The furnishings of such a house are simple: two or three nests, a hopper for the dry mash, a water fountain, and a hopper with three compartments in which are to be kept grit, oyster shells and charcoal. The floor of the house should be as free from encumbrances as possible, since that is the exercising ground; hence most of the furniture should hang upon convenient hooks, out of the way. All over the floor have about three inches of dry loam or very fine sand, and on top, for scratching litter, five or six inches of straw, swale hay, or leaves.

The birds must be induced to exercise, to keep them in good condition, and the best possible exercise is scratching and searching for their grain food, which is scattered into the litter on the floor in the morning and again in mid-afternoon. Many mistakenly think that if a dry-mash mixture is kept before the birds all the time they will eat nothing else, and soon become fat and lazy; this is not the case, because they prefer the whole and cracked grain of which the scratch-feed is composed. They will scratch and search for the grain so long as there is reasonable hope of their search being rewarded by a find; when the grain seems to have all been dug out of the litter they turn to the dry-mash hopper and fill up for the night. They go to the dry mash also for their animal food, which is beef scrap mixed into the mash; they crave a portion of meat food, and they must have a ration of it if we want them to lay well. An egg is very rich in protein, and animal protein, such as beef or milk, makes the best supply of that food element.

The waste from the kitchen and the family table should be fed to the fowls, but should be dry; don't feed anything wet and sloppy! Where there are scraps of meat (trimmings, etc.), they should be chopped up and mixed into the waste from the table, and little fat meat should be fed.

Where one is keeping a small flock it is better to buy the feed ready-mixed than to bother with buying a few pounds of each of a dozen different grains and meals and do the mixing at home. Buy a bag each of dry mash and scratch feed, and if the mash carries no beef scrap buy twenty-five pounds of scrap for a bag of mash; some dry mashes have sufficient scrap in and some do not. Have a supply of dry mash in the hopper all the time, so the birds can eat of it at will, and each morning and mid-afternoon throw a scant handful of scratch feed for each bird into the litter. A convenient way to feed the morning ration of scratch food is to throw it in the litter after dark, after the birds have gone to roost for the night, then it is there ready for them to begin upon as soon as it is light in the morning.

A boy attending school can easily (and will gladly) take care of such a family flock as here described. A ten-year-old schoolboy of our acquaintance takes all the care of such a flock, being paid ten cents a week for it, and the flock of fifteen pullets not only supplies fresh eggs for the family (about two and a half dozen a week), but there is a surplus which pays for all the food bought and the shells, grit, etc.

The droppings should be cleaned from the roost platform three times a week in winter and twice a week in summer, and make a splendid fertilizer for the lawn, shrubbery, etc. Remove the litter three or four times each winter, and supply new; keep the house clean and sweet, keep the birds busy, and they will be happy and lay eggs.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

God's Forgiveness*

EVEN when a man says that he freely forgives, it is seldom that he can blot from his mind the forgiven act. He may wish to, may try to, but the "mended place" too often remains in the memory throughout the whole life. Not so with our God. If we truly repent of our "backsliding," he sheds his dew upon us, until from a broken and stained thing we become "as perfect as the lily" in his sight, with no flaw showing, to call to mind our sin.

There is no limit to his forgiveness. It flows lovingly around us until every blot is made white and every breach is healed. Knowing, as each heart must know, the difficulty which we find in fogiving those who have injured us; and knowing equally well how deeply we have offended God, it is hard for us to believe this, but it is true. How may we be sure of it? Said one of our most saintly preachers:

In order to know that we are forgiven, it is only necessary to look at our Father's love till it sinks into our heart; to open our soul to him till he shall pour his love into it; to wait on him till we find peace, till our conscience no longer torments us.

The famous Swiss faith-healer, Dorothea Trudel, says Gilchrist Lawson, was so overcome when she first experienced a sense of her sins, that her friends thought her to be dying. She apparently felt it to be impossible that God could forgive one so guilty; but little by little, the revelations of his love calmed and strengthened her. Great faith was granted to her through this wonderful realization of God's infinite love, and hundreds were healed in a marvelous manner in response to her prayers.

John Fletcher, called by John Wesley "the most holy man seen upon the earth since the apostolic age," was overcome by the feeling of his sin at the early age of seven. His nurse had reproved him for some misdeed, calling him "very naughty," until the child was almost frantic with the idea of his own wickedness. He prayed ceaselessly until he felt that God had forgiven him.

Throughout his youth he cherished a desire to become a preacher, but a sense of his own unworthiness restrained him. Strangely enough, he turned toward a military life, but a series of accidents defeated his intention to become a soldier. He had received a university education and became a tutor in a private family. Here again he was stricken by a sense of his own sinfulness, and again was almost out of his mind with it. Then some one directed him toward the Methodists, "who," he was told, "pray all day and all night." He joined them, and continued his prayers for God's forgiveness.

"Having continued my supplication till near one in the morning," he wrote on a certain fast day, "I opened my Bible and my eye fell upon these words: 'Cast thy burden on the Lord and he shall sustain thee. He will not suffer the righteous to be moved.' Filled with joy, I again fell on my knees, and I saw myself conqueror over sin, and all manner of affliction, and went cheerfully to take my rest."

Dr. Abbott describes the entireness of God's forgiveness in these beautiful words: "If we have built awry—and who has not?—daubed with untempered mortar, and put unseasoned lumber in, is there any power that can rebuild? . . . The sin in Biblical phraseology is a record, and is blotted out; a stain, and it is washed away. . . . The forgiveness of sin is the sending away of sin; it is a cloud and the sun dries it up; a corpse and it is buried in the depths of the sea."

The Saloon's Allies*

TOO little is usually said of those forms of vice and intemperance which flock with strong drink and drunkenness. Perhaps the most insidious of these is gambling. This is such a fascinating sport, and so often wears an aspect of innocence and even piety, that it has deceived the very elect. Not so very many years ago, our government permitted lotteries and other forms of gambling, and in churches they were almost universal. No other method of raising money is so easy or so sure. The idea of putting in a few cents and possibly taking out many dollars captivates the imagination of the average human being, who does not love work, and who would, if he could, always buy something with nothing.

Long experience has shown to our statesmen and our churches that any form of lottery is demoralizing and degrading. It has shown that the countries where it is officially authorized fail to rise in civilization, and lag far behind those where gambling is prohibited. Experience has shown that the individual man who yields to the temptation of gambling usually sinks to the lowest depths of degradation. Gamblers oftener commit suicide than do other men. The great gambling centers of Europe are estimated by our philosophers to be responsible for an enormous proportion of the vice and misery in the world.

The profits of the so-called (and properly) "gambling-hells" are so great, and their attractiveness to men is so powerful, that in spite of laws and sporadic raids our great cities bristle with them. Their owners bribe the police and other officials into silence, and our good people are so busy with their own affairs that few of them can stop to think of their duty to the public. It is a shame to us all.

But it is not in these public roulette and card-rooms that the habit of gambling is usually formed. Many a boy gets his first taste of the exciting poison of "chance-games" as he "pitches pennies" in the street. A certain good citizen of a great city devotes a considerable share of his time to the summoning of police officers to break up such games. It is a worthy service. No patriotic man or woman should ever find a group of boys engaged in this demoralizing amusement without making a determined effort to check them.

The man who "bets" a hat or a box of candy on the turn of an election, or any other uncertain future event, is, in so far, bolstering up this enemy of progress and righteousness. The angle is of the same size as that of professional gambling, though the side may not be so much prolonged. To steal a chestnut does not appear to be so bad as to steal a bushel of chestnuts, but it is just as much stealing. Don't do it. Say, "I am not a betting man, thank you," whenever you are invited to "take" such a bet. You may be called "silly"; may be told that you are "making a mountain out of a molehill"; may be ridiculed as going as far in the direction of "crankiness" as the professional gambler goes in sin; but never mind. Throw your influence as a Christian, even in apparent trifles, always on the right side.

There are many other sins which follow in the wake of the saloon, but most of them are plainly vile and loathsome. Not so with many forms of gambling; they often look smooth and harmless to the eye, but within they are foul and deadly.

Fixed Income

The certainty of a definite income is one of the most valuable features of the investment bond. The owner of a well secured bond does not have to worry about the condition of the market, as the interest from his investment comes to him as a fixed amount with unfailing regularity.

In considering the investment of funds, this element of absolute definiteness should not be overlooked.

If you are contemplating the placing of funds, we will be pleased to suggest a list of well secured bonds which produce fixed incomes of from 4 per cent. to 6 per cent.

REAL ESTATE VENTURES

As a rule the value of land in any community can be approximately estimated by the density of its population. It follows from this that land values must increase in a ratio corresponding with the increase of population, and that they will decline if for any reason the population falls off.

An exception might be found in mineral lands or in the great wheat farms of the West and the extensive sugar and cotton plantations of the South; but even in the case of agricultural lands the rule will hold good, that their selling value will depend quite as much on the density of the neighboring population as on the profits from crops.

An Australian Illustration

In the early 90's the writer of this article visited Australia and in his journeyings came to the city of Melbourne. A year or two before his arrival, this city had a population of about 400,000, but, for reasons we are about to give, it had fallen off about one-fourth, and the real estate values within the municipal limits had declined nearly one-half. This decline was in excess of the loss of population, and was no doubt largely due to reaction and resultant panic, but there was a good economic reason for a proportionate falling off in land values.

Now, the twenty-five per cent. of Melbourne's population had not left Australia, nor moved to another colony, nor indeed had they gone out of street-car reach of the great city in which most of them still continued to do business. This is how the exodus came about: The people down in Australia speak the same language, belong to the same race, are educated in about the same way, and have the same spiritual and secular aspirations as ourselves; in addition to this, they have all our anxiety to achieve a competency, if not great wealth, by short-cut routes. The people of Melbourne, and the same may be said of the people of Adelaide, Sidney and other Australian cities, had read of the sudden fortunes made or being made through land booms in the neighborhood of American cities, and it struck them that they could get rich quick through the same means as their American cousins, for there was no end of land available and cheap outside the gates of their great municipalities. These people did not know, or if they did they ignored the knowledge, that wealth is not increased by spreading it out, or that, if population is moved from a place of high land values to one of low land values, the latter will appreciate at the expense of the former, though the increase in the one case will be more than offset by the decrease in the other.

This is how it worked: The boomers organized what they called Building and Loan Associations in imitation of the societies that have done so much for the workingman in the United States, but the resemblance ceased with the name, for instead of being honestly co-operative they were managed by men out to exploit the purchaser for their own advantage. Land was bought at a low price by the thousands of acres and laid out in lots, which looked very inviting on the maps with their "parks," "churches," "theaters," "schools," and "athletic fields," the grouped whole being given an attractive name, a thing that has become familiar to our own suburban dwellers. Alluring prospectuses were issued, in which it was pointed out that for the amount of rent paid in the city the workingman, in a few years, could become his own landlord in the suburbs, payments to be made monthly. The plan was full of appeal, and the working people were attracted to it as were the children of Hamelin to the playing of the Pied Piper.

The banks were drawn into this scheme, and money was advanced for the erection of cottages. Even before the cottages were habitable the people began leaving the city in crowds, values rose in the suburbs, and values and rents fell in the cities, where "To Rent" signs soon became conspicuous in residence streets, and even on shops, for the small traders followed their clients to the new homes.

Now, the total population of all Australia is not and never has been as great as that of the State of Pennsylvania, the natural increase is even lower, and because of the distance from the Old World and the corresponding expense for transportation, the immigration is not a factor to be reckoned with. It need not be told that this Australian land boom, like so many ill-considered or actually criminal undertakings of like character in this country, collapsed like a punctured balloon. The disaster was hastened by the world-wide panic of 1892-3, induced by the failure in London of the great banking house of the Barings. Following the failure of these land booms the parliaments of the different colonies began post-mortem investigations, which resulted in the discovery of fraud and the imprisonment of a considerable number of high government officials. But this effort of belated justice was no compensation to a deceived and impoverished people.

Like every other form of investment, that in land requires good judgment and much experience, if the best results are to be had; but, unfortunately, too many of us in our anxiety to be fee-simple landholders are ever too ready to accept without investigation the alluring promises held out by real estate boomers. This fact is well illustrated by a Florida scheme that was presented to the small investors of this country a few years ago, and which was abruptly ended by the Post Office Department, but not till thousands of victims had been robbed of their hard-earned dollars.

A Case Nearer Home

This scheme was as simple as it was alluring. A number of men bought for about a dollar an acre a large tract of land in the wilds of Florida. It was an expanse of sand covered with dwarf pine and scrub oak, and far removed from railroad and water transportation, but the prospectus and maps made a strong appeal to people in the North, to whom Florida was the land of the orange and pineapple, the land of perpetual spring, the land of Ponce de Leon and the Fountain of Youth. In addition, the quarter-acre lots into which this Eden was divided could be had for the mere cost of recording the deeds, which was about $3. This is how the promoters made their money: They bargained with the recorders of deeds in the counties in which they held land, to record copies of the deeds for fifty cents each, so that they made $2.50 on each lot, or say $10 an acre. The original cost and the advertising were about $1.50 an acre, making the net profit $8 on land that was being given away.

A flood of money poured in on the promoters. Other thousands of acres were bought, and when the supply was exhausted or no more could be had on the original terms, the schemers sold lots situated on government property in the everglade swamps. Then the authorities stepped in; arrests were ordered, and the lesson of the gigantic fraud made an impression for a day.

Of course, there are good men engaged in converting farm lands into town lots, and equally of course investors find that they have not been deceived by their dealings with such men. Great fortunes have been and will continue to be made in land ventures, but, as we have shown in another article, these fortunes have not been the result of luck but of good management.

For years, Encyclopaedia publishers have been trying to produce a Loose-Leaf Encyclopaedia—knowing this to be the only way to keep an Encyclopaedia always up to date and have a work that would NEVER GROW OLD. The great difficulty has seemed to invent a Loose-Leaf binder that would be appropriate for a library volume.

Nelson's
Loose-Leaf Perpetual
Encyclopaedia

And Research Bureau for Special Information Has Solved the Problem

In 1907, Thomas Nelson & Sons—established, for over a hundred years in Edinburgh, Scotland—perfected and patented a Loose-Leaf Binder, a volume so practicable that by simply turning a nut the pages are loosened, when the old and obsolete pages can be easily removed and the new pages substituted—thereby making Nelson's Encyclopaedia always new and abreast of the times. The publishers issue to subscribers, twice a year, not less than 250 revised pages—in March and in October. By means of the Loose-Leaf binding device, Nelson's Encyclopaedia contains the latest information, while all other Encyclopaedias quickly grow old.

Bound in 12 Handsome Volumes

NELSON'S IS THE ONLY AUTHENTIC AND RELIABLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA because it is the only one that is new and can be kept new. If you buy Nelson's you will never need to buy another.

NELSON'S RESEARCH BUREAU is maintained entirely at the publishers' expense to supply any special information required by purchasers of the Loose Leaf Encyclopaedia—and it is the only information institution of its kind in the world.

With NELSON'S LOOSE-LEAF ENCYCLOPAEDIA and the services of NELSON'S RESEARCH BUREAU FOR SPECIAL INFORMATION you have at your command—positively guaranteed to you—all the available information and knowledge of the world.

Upwards of a million dollars have been spent and more than 1,200 specialists in all parts of the world have been engaged to make Nelson's the supreme authority for those who know or who want to know. Nelson's has been approved and adopted as an authority by United States Government Departments, and by Universities, Colleges, Libraries and School Boards throughout the country.

NELSON'S LOOSE-LEAF PERPETUAL ENCYCLOPAEDIA is endorsed by newspapers, magazines, scholars, and literary workers in all parts of the world:—

J. G. Schurman, President of Cornell University, Ithaca, New York, says: "I have made constant use of my set of your Encyclopaedia and find it preeminently satisfactory."

The Review of Reviews says: "Nelson's Loose-Leaf Perpetual Encyclopaedia is used as the authority in our Editorial Rooms."

The New York Times says: "Nelson's Encyclopaedia never grows old, that is, never antiquated. It will give answer years after any publication to the most modern of queries."

The New York Independent says: "It is safe to say that the owners of Nelson's are the only owners of Encyclopaedia containments of the recent events. We find it an indispensable work."

Exchange A liberal allowance will be made on old Encyclopaedias to apply as part payment on Nelson's.

Joy in Service*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

HOW it would shock us to have any one speak of the apostle Matthew as a converted thief! Yet we must admit that to be quite probable when we consider that he was a "publican" before he became one of the apostles. Let us throw upon Matthew the publican the searchlight of Judaism. There were two classes of publicans among the tax-gatherers under the Roman law. The gabbai collected taxes on ground and income and were men of great credit and influence; but the mokher, who were the under-publicans, collected taxes on all imports and exports. It is said that "they used their ingenuity to invent taxes and find a name for every kind of exaction, such as on axles, wheels, pack-animals, pedestrians, roads, highways; on admission to markets; on carriers, bridges, ships and quays; on crossing rivers, on dams, on licenses; in short, on such a variety of objects that even the research of modern scholars has not been able to identify all the names." It is also said that "they were accounted as oppressive thieves and pickpockets." The rabbis taught that repentance was next to impossible for a publican."

Matthew undoubtedly belonged to the lower order, because Jesus saw him "sitting at the receipt of custom." If he had been a great gabbai, he would not have been doing that. Jesus did not measure publicans after the Jewish fashion, for when he saw Matthew sitting at the receipt of custom, he said unto him, "Follow me," and Matthew arose and followed him." It was evidently not the first time Matthew had seen Jesus, or he would not have immediately responded to his call. It was quite certain that sometimes, in his line of duty at the seaside, watching for incoming ships, he had heard Jesus preach to the multitudes, and from afar had become his follower. In a business way he was probably acquainted with the four fishermen who had become the apostles of Jesus. It is not unlikely that Jesus had seen Matthew in the crowd of listeners at the seashore, and had read the reasonings in his heart. Or, if Jesus did see him at the receipt of custom for the first time, he knew that this publican was already his follower.

A Converted Thief's Letter

A remarkable letter was read by request of Mr. D. L. Moody at a Gospel meeting in the Corn Exchange in Edinburgh. It was a letter from a converted thief, and was in part as follows:

"Mr. W—friend Charlie, if I may call you so—I know you are surprised to get a letter from me, but I hope you won't be mad at my writing to you. I want to give you my thanks for the way you talked to me when I was in prison. . . . I used to think at night about what you said, and I knocked off swearing five months before my time was up; for I saw it wasn't no good, nohow. The day my time was up, you told me if I would 'shake the cross' [quit stealing], and live on the square for three months, it would be the best job I ever done in all my life. The State agent gave me a ticket to here, and on the car I thought more of what you said to me. But while on the cars, I pulled off an old woman's leather [robbed her of her pocket book]. I hadn't no more than got it off, when I wished I hadn't done it; for a while before that I made up my mind to be a square bloke for three months on your word, but forgot it when I saw the leather was a gif [easy to get]. But I kept close to her, and when she got out of the car

For

ENGAGED COUPLES

THIS is particularly for engaged couples. Near-engaged couples won't be barred. Couples who have "broken it off," but whose intentions are serious, will still be considered eligible. But no bachelors need apply. What do you think of eugenics?

What's that? You don't know what it is? You don't like these new religions? Why, bless your heart, it's a science. Its founder called it "The Science of Human Improvement," and if you don't know anything about it you had better read THE DELINEATOR for April.

What Makes Blue Eyes?

EUGENICS has discovered one queer law about eyes. Brown-eyed parents may have a blue-eyed child. Eyes are blue because they lack brown pigment. But when a blue-eyed man marries a blue-eyed woman, all their descendants will have blue eyes so long as they mate with blue-eyed people. This is interesting, but not necessarily important.

But when it comes to the badder and sadder traits that children inherit, it's mighty important.

Fortune-Telling from Fact

EUGENICS investigates past generations in order to insure the future. If you know some of the tendencies the child is bound to have, you can not only teach and train it more intelligently, but you can be of real service in helping a marriage that will turn out happily.

EUGENIC Societies are working in every civilized country comparing notes and filing records. In THE DELINEATOR for April is one of the first authoritative public statements about their work. These facts that the eugenists are collecting are going to have a great bearing some day on the paupers, the insane, and the non-producers that the State is now called on to support,

If you are not a subscriber, may we say that THE DELINEATOR for April will appear in an unusually good-looking cover. On a background of white appears a lovely girl in a wonderful maline hat. In order to have more room for the beautiful lady, so that you could cut her out if you chose, the name of the magazine has been put 'way down at the bottom of the page—so don't overlook it. Inside this lovely cover you will find a lot of good reading.

Just get THE DELINEATOR and see for yourself at a wayside place, I said, 'Marm, have you lost anything?' She tumbled [discovered] her leather was off. 'Isn't this it?' says I, giving it to her. 'Well, if you ain't honest!' says she. But I hadn't got cheek enough to stand that sort of talk, so I left her in a hurry.

"When I got here, I had one dollar and twenty-five cents left, and I didn't get no work for three days. The afternoon of the third day I spent my last ten cents for two moons [large round sea biscuits] and some cheese. I felt pretty rough, and was thinking I would have to go on the dip again [pocket picking], when I thought of what you once said about a fellow calling on the Lord when he was in hard luck. I thought I would try it once anyhow; but when I tried it, I got stuck on the start, and all I could get off was: 'Lord, give a poor fellow a chance to square it for three months for Christ's sake. Amen.' I kept a thinking of it over and over as I went along. As I was walking along, I heard a big noise, and saw a horse running away with a carriage and two children in it. I grabbed up a piece of box cover from the sidewalk and ran into the middle of the street, and when the horse came up I smashed him over the head as hard as I could drive. The board split to pieces, and the horse checked up a little, and I grabbed the reins and pulled his head down until he stopped.

The gentleman that owned him came running up, and as soon as he saw the children were all right he shook hands with me and gave me a $50 greenback. I was so thunderstruck I couldn't drop the reins nor say anything. He saw something was up, and coming back to me said, 'My boy, are you hurt?' The thought came into my head just then to ask him for work; and I asked him to take back the bill, and give me a job. Says he, 'Jump in here, and let's talk about it; but keep the money.' He asked me if I could take care of horses, and I said, 'Yes.' He told me he wanted a man for that work, and he would give me $16 a month, and board me. You bet I took that chance at once. That night, in my little room over the stable, I sat a long time thinking over my past life, and of what had just happened, and I just got down on my knees, and thanked the Lord for the job, and asked him to help me to square it. The next morning I done it again, and got some new togs [clothing] and a Bible; for I made up my mind after what the Lord had done for me, I would read the Bible every night and morning, and ask him to keep an eye on me. . . . Now, Charley, the three months on the square are up two months ago; and, as you said, it is the best job I ever did in my life. I commenced another of the same sort right away, only it is, God helping me, to last a lifetime. I write this letter to tell you I do think God has forgiven my sins, and heard your prayers, for you told me you should pray for me. I feel that God has called me, and on the first Sunday in July I will join the church. I am doing well, and everybody here treats me as kind as they can. This letter is from your very true friend, C. W."

Matthew the publican did not write such a letter as this; but more—he wrote a glorious Gospel to teach all people how they might become followers of the Lord Jesus, and the wonder of it is that he wrote especially for the Jews, that they might see in Jesus their long-expected Messiah. He thus sought to bless the people who had most contemned him.

Matthew Seeking Other Converts

Did Matthew scorn the publicans, with whom he had formerly been associated? Not he. Instead, he made a great feast, and invited them to come to his house to meet Jesus and hear him talk. Jesus was the guest of honor on that occasion. It is told that many publicans and sinners sat down with Jesus and his disciples at the feast that day in Matthew's house. There were critics at the door—onlookers, men of high degree, even the Pharisees. They asked the disciples of Jesus—Peter, James, John and the others—how it was that their Master ate with publicans and sinners. Jesus heard their question, and answered them himself: "They that are whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick. I came not to call the righteous, but sinners." So Matthew, by inviting "publicans" to meet Jesus, had shown that he had indeed the spirit of his Master.

At another feast, the last Passover Supper, with only his apostles present, Jesus gave this solemn injunction: "When thou art converted, strengthen the brethren" (Luke 22: 32). If all the followers of Jesus would do this, how quickly all of the people in the world would become Christians!

The Feasting Christ

On the very day of the feast in Matthew's house there was a fast among the disciples of John the Baptist, and some of the Pharisees—some who had participated in the fast—came as onlookers at Matthew's house, and there they saw the feasting Christ and his disciples, and they compared him with John, whose meat had been locusts and wild honey, and they asked of Jesus, "Why do thy disciples fast not?" To this Jesus replied that the days of their fasting had not yet come. Jesus had had his fast of forty days alone in the wilderness, that for our sakes he might be tempted in all points, and yet without sin; and he had now come to feasting, that he might by another avenue enter into the hearts and minds of those he had come to save.

Mozoomdar, in his book, The Oriental Christ, says: "Feasting is a small thing, but no religious community has ever got on without a common meal. We can not be fed upon rebukes, sermons and tears always. Christ rebuked, he taught, he wept, but he ate and drank with those whom he taught and rebuked. . . . What free spontaneity must there have been for those beloved early disciples to feel festive glory in the presence of Christ, being set free from the harsh, narrow despotism of the Pharisees, from the bonds of sin and remorse, from the cares and anxieties of worldly life, their burdens borne by the Master's mysterious power, their yoke made light by their sweet love to him, partaking to their hearts' content of his holiness, peace and wisdom."

Jesus made a comparison of the old times with the new, by using for an illustration something which they were accustomed daily to see—old skin bottles, so dry that they had no further usefulness, and fresh skin bottles, which freely expanded to every amount of pressure put within them. There is no doubt about it; the happiest people in the world are the Christian people. Their joys leave no sting behind, but only sweet memory and refreshment. Our Christ will go with us to every feast and every pleasure which it is safe for us to have.

The White Door Settlement

FOURTEEN years ago the White Door Gospel Settlement was founded by Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, at No. 211 Clinton Street, New York City. To-day it has thirty-eight clubs and weekly classes, an equipment that is altogether outgrown, and a long waiting list of classes and clubs which it cannot accommodate for lack of room. The work is religious, but not denominational. It teaches young people how to meet and overcome the temptations of every-day life, and how to become the right kind of citizens and home-makers. All the clubs associated with the White Door co-operate in helping the Health Department and Street Cleaning Department, while the members of the Women's Club of ninety members, composed of Jewish and Irish and German women, carry out the Settlement idea by providing through its dues coal, wood, provisions and medicine to needy neighbors; and the children teach other children the standards learned at the "White Door."

A large proportion of the work of the White Door Settlement is charity. Poor families are helped, and the starving fed; sick mothers and babies are cared for; the deserving unemployed are helped to new employment. Invalids are taken to fresh-air retreats, and in many other ways the Gospel of humanity and helpfulness is practically illustrated. This year, the White Door finds itself facing a crisis. It has a heavy debt, which can only be paid by appealing to the liberality of its friends. Any readers who are interested in Mrs. Bird's work and in the White Door should address Mrs. John E. Wilson, Treasurer for the House Committee, 260 West Seventy-sixth Street, New York City.

not happy. At last one day a man came to the court and said:

"I can make your son happy. But you must pay me my own price for telling the secret."

"Well," said the king, "I will give you whatever you ask."

So the man took the boy into a room, and wrote something on a piece of paper with milk. The writing did not show.

"Go and hold it in front of the light [candle]," he said.

The boy did as he was told. The writing turned brown, and the boy read: "Do a kindness to some one every day." The young prince began to live by that motto, and became the happiest boy anywhere to be found.

Let the teacher tell the story of Matthew as a man who had often stood by the sea and seen the kind things which Jesus did in healing the sick, feeding the hungry, helping the fishermen, speaking kind words, etc.; how he began to love Jesus, although he had himself been very unkind to people. Tell them that Jesus knew Matthew had become his loving friend, and one day when Jesus saw him at his place of business, he asked him to leave his money business and work with him in all his loving work for other people; and Matthew was glad to go with Jesus. Describe the party which Matthew gave at his own house, to which he invited men who had not learned to love Jesus, selfish, bad men. Matthew invited them to meet Jesus, and when they saw his loving kindness, many of them gave up their bad ways and became his followers.

The Protection of Publicity

"It is the degree of publicity, rather than the stringency of the law, which gives to the public any real protection."
From the report of the Railway Securities Commission appointed by President Taft. President Arthur T. Hadley of Yale University, Chairman.

"In publicity, complete publicity, concerning investment issues, will be found the corrective for many present corporation ills. Nothing else can restore confidence in American constructive investment so speedily and so completely."
John Grant Dater, Financial Editor, Munsey Publications.

PUBLICITY is being generally recognized by authorities as the most effective protection for the investing public. The American Real Estate Company recognized this fact nearly twenty years ago, and since 1895 has opened its books to the audit of certified public accountants and its properties to independent appraisal. The certificates of these competent authorities accompany its annual financial statement. In the extension of its real estate business, to which it is restricted by charter, its bond offerings to the public are made on a basis of established fact, and the Company voluntarily gives its investors this full measure of publicity now generally agreed on as necessary for the public good.

The safeguard of publicity in this case proves the ample security afforded by the actual, tangible values underlying the properties on which are based its 6 per cent. Gold Bonds issued and offered in these two forms:

6% Coupon Bonds—For the direct investment of $100, $500, $1,000, and upward, earning 6 per cent. interest, payable semi-annually.

5% Accumulative Bonds—For the investment of $25 and upward annually, to mature $1,000 or more in 10, 15, or 20 years.

These bonds are the direct obligations of the American Real Estate Company and based on its actual ownership of millions of dollars' worth of select New York real estate. They have paid 6 per cent. and matured principal on the stroke of the clock for 24 years, returning to investors over $8,000,000.

The Still Small Voice

IN THE early times of Indiana there were no railroads, and none of the present excellent facilities of transportation. The meager mode of transit consisted of a horse or team, or the slower—Daniel Boone's style—afoot.

The "Wilsons," leading bankers in the West at that time, were anxious to transport a large sum of money to the northern part of Indiana. What perplexed them was the selection of the right kind of man to undertake the delivery of $10,000 safely to destination and run the gauntlet of any prospective robbers along the lonely highway. After much thought they hit upon a young unmarried man, strong and trustworthy—Robert Ruckle—to undertake the perilous trip. The plan adopted was for young Ruckle to mount a strong, fleet horse, with two saddlebags and two revolvers, the former to hold the $10,000. Relays of horses were arranged for along the way.

The morning of departure arrived, preparations were completed for the long horseback ride, a tender good-by was said to father and mother and friends. The bankers gave him encouragement and bade him godspeed. Ruckle mounted his horse; then all cheered and waved their handkerchiefs. He took off his hat and waved adieu to all, every eye watching him out of sight.

On he rode out through the country across the White and Wabash Rivers, passing the pawpaw trees, the sycamores and black walnuts, and occasional farmhouses and red barns that broke the monotony of the lonely way. He had time for thought and was not bored with gossips. Nightfall brought him to a roadhouse or tavern where he passed the night, very careful and watchful of his treasure.

After starting out the second day on the trip along dense woods and swamps, a great temptation swept over his soul. "What if I should take this $10,000 and flee? Who could trace me in this lonely country?" Every step of the ride that day, the temptation grew stronger, until it fairly enveloped him. It absorbed his thoughts. He tried to shake it off, but in vain. He was apparently on the verge of yielding and becoming a robber, when he seemed to hear his mother's voice. She was reading her Bible as usual, at the passage, "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out: and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God: and I will write upon him my new name."

Like a thunderclap this broke the spell of temptation. Robert was back again in the old traces, penitent for having given heed to the tempter. It was the still small voice of the Holy Spirit that had saved the $10,000 intact, and saved the soul of the young man from the tempter.

The treasure was safely delivered at its destination. Years rolled on. The young man married, and afterward became the nominee for governor of a Western State.

A mother's voice has worked wonders. Her pleading has saved many a man. What love equals or surpasses mother love? Only one—Divine love! This had saved him!

The Peasant's Fagot

IT IS told that, when John Huss was bound to the stake on July 1, 1416 (writes Rev. David Smith in The British Weekly), an old peasant woman came with a fagot, begging that it might be added to the pile; and when it was flung on, she was not content: it must be close up to the victim, so that it might help to consume him. "Have I ever harmed you or yours," asked Huss, "that you are so bitter against me?" "Never," was the reply, "but you are a heretic. Wood is scarce this year, and the winter, they say, is like to be a hard one. I can ill afford the fagot, but I would fain do God's service by helping to rid the earth of an accursed heretic; and therefore I make the sacrifice." "Oh, holy simplicity!" exclaimed the martyr. And, reaching out his hand, he drew the fagot toward him, and placed it against his side. "Perhaps," he said, "the fagot may help to save us both." He recognized a kindred spirit in the old peasant. That zeal for God which made her in her darkness a persecutor, would, had her reason been enlightened, have made her a martyr. St. Bernard has told us how we may build pillar after pillar until the House of Conscience is securely based; but there is a simpler direction, a surer way: Make Jesus the Lord of your conscience; lay your will alongside of his example; submit your judgment to him, and make his Spirit the arbiter. It is the light of his face that enlightens the reason.

Though I have been living in Siam for many years, this was the first native state dinner I had seen served in this style. There were eight courses, consisting of soup, fish, salad, chicken pie, beef, ham, peafowl, duck, with potatoes, peas, carrots and asparagus, ending with plum pudding and coffee. One of the judges gave a toast to the governor and asked Dr. Peoples to respond. He did, and the response from all was given with hearty sympathy.

"After wishing the governor many happy years in his beautiful palace, we bade him good-night, feeling that we had been royally entertained, and had enjoyed all the ceremonies. Outside at the pavilion the crowds were enjoying the various plays, and the native music, consisting of drums, gongs, dulcimers, flutes and stringed instruments. Spirit-worship was not observed in any of the ceremonies, which is very unusual. The governor abandoned the practice himself several years ago, and has lately issued a proclamation forbidding spirit-worship. No drunkenness was seen nor rough language heard during all the ceremonies, which speaks well for the Laos people."

From correspondence and notes of Mrs. Sarah Wirt Peoples and Mr. William McCluskey, of Nan, Laos, Siam.

How it smooths the rugged road!
How it seems to help me onward

Like a little talk with Him.

No-Rim-Cut Tires—10% Oversize Touch the Million Mark

This month we celebrate. A million Goodyear Auto Tires have now gone into use.

Over half that million have been sold within the past 12 months. Yet this is our 13th year.

Think what that means. More sold in this last year alone than in 12 years put together.

Just because No-Rim-Cut tires—our patented type—suddenly became the sensation.

A few men proved them out. Then thousands proved them—then tens of thousands more.

Now a million tires. Now a trebled demand over last year. Now a larger sale than any other tire commands.

All this occurs after these tires have been tested on some 200,000 cars.

The Reign of the New-Type Tire

Now comes the reign of a new-type tire—a tire that cuts tire bills in two.

A tire that can't rim-cut—an oversize tire, to save the blowouts due to overloading.

A hookless tire—one that needs no tire bolts, nor hooking to the rim.

And a tire which embodies the final results of our 13 years spent in perfecting tires.

All these features combined in a tire which costs no more than other standard tires.

That will explain this overwhelming demand for Goodyear No-Rim-Cut tires.

Old-Type Tires Must Go

Old-type tires—clincher tires—rim-cut when partly deflated. When they run flat, because of a puncture, a minute's time may wreck them.

Statistics show that 23 per cent. of all ruined clincher tires have been rim-cut.

Now comes a type which makes rim-cutting impossible. And all of you motorists are sometime bound to adopt them.

These same tires—No-Rim-Cut tires—are made 10 per cent. oversize. The hookless base permits that.

That means 10 per cent. more air—10 per cent. greater carrying capacity—without any extra cost.

It means support for your extras, and for passengers who overweigh. It reduces the danger of blow-outs.

That 10 per cent. oversize, under average conditions, adds 25 per cent. to the tire mileage.

All those advantages at the price of tires which lack them. How long will any man cling, in your estimation, to old-type, skimpy tires?

The Secret

The secret of this new-type tire lies in three flat bands of 126 braided wires.

These braided wires are vulcanized into the tire base. Thus the tire base is made unstretchable.

This tire needs no beads to hook into the rim flange, because nothing can force the tire over the flange.

But, unlock the flange and the tire slips off like any quick-detachable tire. It slips off much easier, because no beads can get "frozen" into the rim flange.

With this hookless tire, your removable rim flanges are slipped to the opposite sides. Then they curve outward instead of inward.

Instead of a curved flange digging into the tire there is a rounded edge on which the tire rests if deflated.

There is no changing of rims if your rims are standard. Nearly all rims are now made to fit these tires.

We Control It

This braided wire feature forms the only way to make a practical tire of this type. The reasons are explained in our Tire Book.

Competition, of course, has forced other makers to attempt this hookless tire. But the essential feature is controlled by our patents. And substitute features have proved unsatisfactory. Many have been abandoned.

This new-type tire, if you want it right, means the Goodyear No-Rim-Cut tire. That is why the demand, in a flood-like way, has centered on this tire.

Get the proved-out tire when you get this type. Get the tire which outsells all the rest after a million have gone into use.

Our 1912 Tire Book—based on 13 years spent in tire-making—is filled with facts you should know. Ask us to mail it to you.

OUR · MAIL · BAG

Questions and Answers

C. F. A., Augusta, Ga. 1. Please explain Acts 2: 34. 2. Also I. Cor. 14: 34.

1. Peter is here correcting a misinterpretation of the psalm in which David spoke not of himself, as many supposed, but of Christ. The passage should be read in connection with verses 25, 26, 27 and Psalm 110: 1, which was clearly a foregleam of the Messianic ascension. 2. This passage has already been recently explained in THE MAIL-BAG.

S., Stanton, Minn. 1. What is the meaning of Isa. 8: 19 and 13: 11? 2. Also I. John 2: 18 and chapter 4, verse 3 and II. John 7? 3. Also Heb. 5: 14?

1. Isaiah was here addressing God's believing people and warning them against the sin of giving heed to witchcraft and seeking after familiar spirits, as such sin always followed in the wake of idolatry. There were tricksters in those days who by ventriloquism and other means pretended to have communication with the dead, just as some spiritualistic charlatans do to-day. The punishment here meant (chapter 13: 11) is for the wicked of the world. Arrogance was Babylon's besetting sin. 2. In John's day Antichrist teachers had appeared and had been exposed and driven out from Christian fellowship and he warned believers against their seductions and exhorted them to abide in Christ. The same warning is repeated in another form in chapter 4, verse 3, coupled with a renewed denunciation of false prophets. "Every spirit" is here interpreted to mean "every teacher claiming inspiration by the Holy Spirit." He repeats the warning in the passage in II. John 7, the essential point of all these warnings being to confirm the church in its faith in the divinity of Jesus Christ and the authority of his mission. 3. The confirmed and experienced Christian is no longer a child spiritually, but is able to distinguish between sound and unsound doctrine. The warning is against "strange doctrines," by which those who do not discriminate may be greatly troubled.

Mrs. J. J., Tyner, Saskatchewan. Kindly explain in THE MAIL-BAG John 12: 37-40. These verses seem to infer that all cannot be saved, even if they would. Is not this predestination?

In these verses, the evangelist is recording his own reflections on the scenes he describes. Having reached the close of Christ's public ministry, John casts a regretful glance at the apparent fruitlessness of that ministry among a large proportion of the people. Their unbelief, while it did not set aside the purpose of God (who "tempteth no man"), simply fulfilled the expectation of the prophet Isaiah, who pictured those who rejected divine truth as having wilfully closed their hearts against it, and having shown by their unbelief and impenitence an attitude which did not permit of belief. It is not inconsistent to read verse 40, as some interpreters have it: "He hath permitted their eyes to be shut and their hearts to be hardened." It would, however, be inconsistent to interpret it as meaning that God had extended the offer of salvation to men whom he had first made incapable of receiving it.

I. W. T., Philadelphia, Pa. Where can be found the number of wise men who visited the Saviour? Three are mentioned, but why?

The Scripture record does not tell the number, but there are several ancient and well-preserved traditions in the Eastern Church which throw light on the subject. Some of these even give the names of the three Magian princes as Melchior, Caspar and Balthasar. According to the tradition, they arrived in Jerusalem with a large retinue. Early Christian writers devote much attention to the "Three Kings," and great reverence was paid to them. The number was supposed to be a symbol of the Trinity. Possibly the expressions in Ps. 72: 10, 11 and Isa. 49: 23 had an important influence in determining the character of early Christian literature on the subject.

A. H. G., New Haven, Conn. A, who has always tried to live a careful, prayerful Christian life, for years has had poor health. By means of surgery the trouble was relieved and the pain has been steady. A believes God answered the many prayers and blessed the efforts of the surgeon, doctors, family, friends, and medicine. B claims A has no Biblical authority for such belief; that Christ wishes to be the Great Healer and needs no agencies to assist. He contends that had A only had faith and used prayer all suffering and surgery would have been avoided. Why are not surgery and medicine God's gifts, to be used by us, as much as food? Is not Christ the Bread of Life as much as the Great Physician? And yet people eat and drink.

Both are right. A did according to his faith when he employed the best means at hand and asked God to add his blessing. B was right in claiming that Christ is the Great Physician who pardons our sins and heals our diseases. It is simply a question of faith. The divine power is as potent to-day as in apostolic times, if our faith were sufficiently strong to permit us to realize it.

M. B. L., Sparta, Ill. 1. In Matt. 1: 17, how many years are included in fourteen generations? 2. Taking into consideration the promise made to Abraham in Gen. 15: 5, and the settlement by him of the children of Keturah (as given in Gen. 25), it is reasonable to suppose that the Chinese are his posterity? 3. Of what tribe and family was Jabez, who is spoken of in I. Chron. 4: 9?

1. Approximately 2,163 years, according to Kitto, Smith and other authorities. 2. Keturah's descendants have been variously claimed as Arabs and Turks, but never, so far as known, as Chinese. 3. Jabez was a descendant of the tribe of Judah, but of what particular family does not appear.

Mrs. C. W. R., Watertown, N. Y. Kindly explain Luke 21: 25-34.

These verses have been a fruitful subject of discussion among commentators. In this prophecy there is a double reference—the immediate one being to the impending destruction of Jerusalem and the ultimate reference to the final coming of Christ. Interpreters are not agreed as to the meaning of "the sign of the Son of Man in heaven" (see Matt. 24: 30), but all concur that it will be one universally and immediately recognized, and that it will be followed by his actual coming, as described by Luke. The expression "this generation" in verse 32 means that those who heard the prophecy of immediate import would see its fulfilment, which they did, as Jerusalem's downfall followed shortly afterward.

J. E. T., Kingfield, Me., writes: "Your answer to G. W. P., of Lebanon Junction, Ky., relates to the question of sin. You refer to Rom. 7th chapter from 7th to 24th verse. I cannot see how any man can believe that that is the experience of 'every man.' Paul is not describing the experience of a Christian man, but an awakened sinner under the law. Paul declares that the 'carnal mind is enmity against God, it is not subject to his law, neither indeed can be.' Our best modern commentators now declare that the 7th of Romans is not the experience of a regenerated man. Dr. Vincent also (in his New Testament Word Studies) declares that it is the experience of an unregenerate man seeing the light and powerless through the law to walk in it. But in the 8th chapter and 2d verse, he triumphantly declares, 'for what the law could not do,' etc., 'For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death.' What did Jesus come to do if he did not come to destroy sin and give deliverance to his people?"

Mrs. A. J. S., Bethlehem, Pa. In what respect did the attitude of Confucius and Mencius differ from that of the Hebrew prophets?

Mencius was the pupil of Confucius and both were moralists. Mencius taught of the intrinsic goodness of human nature, although he admitted that humanity had become perverted. He also taught of benevolence and righteousness. He wrote, "If a man once rectify his heart, little else will remain to do." Confucius aimed to regulate manners and morals, not to found a religion. His system was ethical and political. Although he spoke of heaven, it has been questioned whether he recognized the existence of a personal Supreme God. In the teachings of both, the attainment of perfect virtue by the observance of certain cardinal principles was inculcated. There is a wide distinction between such teachings and those of the major and minor prophets of the Hebrews, who taught that God is over all, the ruler and the supreme and omnipotent All-Creator and disposer, with punishments and rewards in his hand; that he is the fountain of all virtue and goodness, the pardoner of sin, the Father of all, the preserver and leader of his people and the source from which all moral and spiritual law and all blessings emanate. The Hebrew prophets were annalists, poets, historians, preachers not only of morals, but of a deeply spiritual religion. They were regarded as divinely inspired and authoritative exponents of the law, and as instruments of revealing God's will to man in past, present and future events. Any attempt to compare the teachings of the Chinese sages with those of the Hebrew prophets reveals very little ground of similarity.

A. E., Rockford, Ill. 1. Whom do the four beasts mentioned in the fourth chapter and sixth verse of Revelation represent? 2. Also the beast mentioned in the last verse of the thirteenth chapter of Revelation, which had power to perform miracles?

1. The beasts were symbols of the carnal man, who by rebellion loses his true glory as lord, under God, of the lower creatures and is degraded to the level of a beast. 2. This verse has been a great subject of discussion and many books have been written on the subject without definite result. The number is held to indicate, symbolically, Antichrist, the broken world-power, ripe for judgment. Another view is that it represents the political power of Rome, which had so long persecuted the church. To enumerate the many and varying conclusions of commentators on this subject is unnecessary. As John writes, "spiritual wisdom" is needed to solve it.

W. B. M., Princeton, Ind. 1. Who "sold the righteous for silver and the poor for a pair of shoes?" 2. Who burned the bones of the king of Edom into lime?

See Amos 2: 1, 6, also chapter 8: 6.

Chinese Amazons Who Enlisted to Fight for the Republic

THIS photograph shows a band of young women soldiers who are reported to have done valiant service in the field for the revolutionaries. They are students at the Chinese Government Girls' School in Shanghai, and were the first to organize and begin drilling. Their idea was to go to the front and fight for freedom from the Manchu rule, beside their brothers and fathers. They are small, like most Chinese women, but are sturdy and have plenty of endurance. They have been drilled steadily for as long as three hours at a time, carrying regular army guns. Chinese women as a rule have none of the ills that weaken Continental and American women. They are used to working hard, and since the law against foot-binding went into effect they are, of course, fully able to handle themselves.

Miscellaneous

H. D. K., Humboldt, Neb. See answer concerning Simeon in MAIL-BAG of February 28.

R. X. F., Chicago. See answer to A. E., Rockford, Ill., on same subject.

Reader, Bogue, Kan. 1. The passage in I. Cor. 7: 36-38 has already been discussed in THE MAIL-BAG recently. 2. The "religion" referred to has been aptly characterized as "Christianity without Christ."

M. N., Geneva, N. Y. There is no passage in the teachings of Christ that can be construed as having reference to secret fraternities.

J. A. D., Denver, Colo., writes that the author of the poem "Doe ye nexte thynge" (mentioned as anonymous in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD) was the late Mrs. George A. Paull, a writer of children's books, who died in 1895.

C. M., Seneca Falls, N. Y. The word "cousin" in Luke 1: 36 and 58 (used in the Authorized Version) is given a somewhat vague and wide meaning as the rendering of a Hebrew word which would be more properly translated as "blood relative" or "kinsman." Just how close this relationship was between Mary and Elisabeth cannot be determined.

F. H., Petersburg, Va. "Old Abe," the eagle who lived for some time in the capitol at Madison, Wis., was suffocated by smoke during a fire in the building. He was stuffed by a taxidermist and placed in a glass case in the main hall of the capitol. In a recent fire, he was totally destroyed. We cannot learn that an eagle was ever kept in the capitol at Washington.

A Strike That Tied up a Nation

TWO million people in discontented idleness; thousands of spindles, looms and forges silent and useless; railways running on reduced schedules and in the harbors thousands of ships unable to put to sea! This, in a few words, was the state of affairs in Great Britain a few days after the most paralyzing strike that the world has ever seen was called by the coal miners of the United Kingdom. Although England has had serious labor troubles in years gone by, she had never before faced anything so serious as this.

The situation was not sprung upon the nation unannounced, as the laws of Great Britain require thirty days' notice to be given by employees. So from the latter part of January until the 1st of March increasingly energetic attempts were made by the various Conciliation Boards, the British Board of Trade, and by the government itself to bring about an agreement which would do away with the possibilities of a strike. In spite of all these efforts, however, the miners' organizations set the 1st of March as the date for a nation-wide cessation of work in the collieries. A week before that date arrived the government had taken steps to bring about a basis of operation upon which the arbitration might be based. Days of conferences between the leaders of the miners, the labor representatives in the House of Commons, members of the Cabinet and the coal owners produced no further results than the announcement that about 65 per cent. of the mine owners and lessees had agreed to the demands of the strikers for the establishment of a minimum wage scale throughout the various coal mining districts.

The greatest difficulty experienced in the negotiations was due to the position of the miners themselves, who, having stated their demands for a minimum wage, and having named the figures upon which they had decided, absolutely refused to enter into negotiations which would affect this decision or to guarantee a minimum production.

The first actual strike took place on February 26, when the men of the Alfretor pits in Derbyshire ceased work. On the two days following, thousands of miners in Nottinghamshire and Yorkshire carried out their announced intention and deserted the collieries. During the next few days, while almost frantic attempts were being made by the government and by the Conciliation Board and by the new Trade Disputes Industrial Council, which the Board of Trade had formed with Sir George R. Askwith as chief commissioner and Mr. H. J. Wilson as registrar, to bring the mine operators and the miners to a basis of settlement, the workers in Wales and the south of Scotland joined the movement, and every coal mine of any importance in the British Isles was deserted.

Sir George R. Askwith and Mr. H. J. Wilson

The effects of the strike began to make themselves felt almost immediately. In the south of Scotland and in Wales an extremely ugly spirit developed among the miners, and it became necessary to call in troops as a precautionary measure against the recurrence of such disorders as took place in Wales in connection with the last coal miners' strike. The wheels of industry began to slow down within a very few days. The railways announced reduced schedules, and the great manufacturing centers served notice upon their employees that as soon as the stock of coal in their yards was exhausted it would be necessary for them to shut down the mills.

Throughout the midland section of England the miners seemed to accept the situation largely as a holiday, and there has been little or no ill-feeling engendered between them and the mine operators, for it was almost unanimously agreed by the controlling interests of the mines in that section that they would willingly grant the increase for which the miners are striking. The gravest aspect of the whole situation developed from the obduracy of the South Wales, Northumberlandshire and south of Scotland mine operators. The deadlock became graver as it was learned that as the mine owners and operators were being won over to the acceptance of the strikers' demands, they themselves were throwing a greater obstacle in the way of settlement by insisting upon the very letter of their demand, rather than upon the concession of the principle of a minimum wage. As the public learned that they were unwilling to leave the adjustment of details to subsequent arbitration under the supervision of the government, its sympathies veered from the miners, who had up to that time enjoyed the moral support of practically the entire nation as well as of the government.

Premier Asquith had announced that the government would, if necessary, enact a law requiring the payment of minimum wage by the mine owners, and in this they were generally endorsed by public opinion, which was entirely against the obdurate operators. It was not until the position of the miners was

HOPES OF PEACE AT LAWRENCE

AFTER a strike of eight weeks' duration, resulting in the loss to both sides of something like $2,000,000, there are hopes at last of an end to the industrial war at Lawrence, Mass. The mill-owners made an offer of a minimum wage increase of 5 per cent. to become effective on March 4. This was regarded as a first step toward a settlement of the troubles, and the employees of the Arlington and Pacific Mills, together with some 500 wool-sorters and 300 mule spinners, voted to return to work. The "Industrial Workers of the World," however, remained firm in their demand for a 15 per cent. increase, double pay for overtime, the abolition of the premium system, the re-employment of all the strikers without distinction, and the withdrawal of the charges against strike leaders Ettor and Giovannitti, who were held for the grand jury.

As an attempt to prevent the return of employees to work was feared, police precautions were redoubled, and the military was ordered to go on duty to guard the works and prevent the renewal of disturbances. It was known that the strike committee had made arrangements for picket lines on a large scale, with the view of preventing the workers from returning to the mills; nevertheless, the prospect of the return of a very considerable number was a promising one.

In their proposed readjustment of the wage scale, the mill-owners promised to proceed upon a comparative basis as to occupations, giving increases in the rates formerly paid by the hour and by the piece; such increases to be in no case less than 5 per cent. They promised steady employment, and extended a welcome back to any of the former employees, without discrimination, who applied before Wednesday, March 6. There are 38,200 hands affected in the entire group of mills. President Golden of the United Textile Workers of America, upon learning of the offer of the owners said: "I am pleased to hear of it. Unless it affected all the operatives, skilled and unskilled, irrespective of nationality, we could not endorse it."

Troop "B," Massachusetts State Militia, Passing Through the Italian Quarter of Lawrence

Hon. John N. Cole, ex-speaker of the House of Representatives of Massachusetts, in a letter to the Outlook presents the manufacturers' point of view in the Lawrence strike. He says the mill-owners did not reduce wages without warning; that only a small percentage of the workers are low-paid because unskilled, that the highest class of skilled operators are employed at good wages and that the average wage is over $9 per week. The published attempts to picture the workers as poor and miserable in dress and appearance are totally unjust. The hours of labor in Lawrence are four a week less than in any other State, six less than in many States and twelve less than in some. He claims that the real issue in Lawrence is the establishment of an anarchistic and socialistic movement that shall hereafter control the textile business of the State and ultimately that of other States. He denies the charge of excessive manufacturers' profits. Finally, Mr. Cole declares the manufacturers have always been foremost in helping to improve living conditions in Lawrence. In his view, the situation has been grossly misrepresented for the purpose of creating dissatisfaction and justifying disorder.

Fifty strikers went to Washington and appeared before a Congressional Committee to give the workers' side of the general situation. With them were several children. In testifying, before the House Committee on Rules, President Golden of the Textile Workers' Union made the charge that the men who had gone to Lawrence from New York had poisoned the minds of the workers and preached to them not trades unionism but anarchy and revolution.

Much of the testimony given at the hearing related to the brutality of the troops and police, and it made a deep impression. During the hearing on Wednesday, March 6, Mrs. Taft sat an interested auditor, while the Lawrence authorities denied the stories of cruelty and barbarity which had been testified to by a number of witnesses. The chief of police of Lawrence defended the soldiers and police against the charge of striking the workers. He declared that every effort had been made to aggravate the soldiers and policemen. Asked regarding the stopping of children being sent away from Lawrence, he said he had no knowledge that the women in charge of them were their mothers. There was no evidence that the parents had consented to their going. He blamed the strike leaders for stirring up all the trouble and encouraging the women to go out and make martyrs of themselves. One man, a Syrian, called for twenty-five men to volunteer to throw themselves on the soldiers' bayonets in order to stir up sympathy throughout the country.

An investigation of the strike situation is now being conducted by Dr. C. P. Neill, Commissioner of Labor from Washington. Meanwhile, it is said that civil proceedings are to be instituted against the Massachusetts State authorities for preventing the women and children from leaving the city, when they wished to go to other cities where support had been offered by private individuals.

THE STRIKE THAT TIED UP A NATION

more fully understood and the shortage of coal had commenced to have disastrous consequences on the industries and commerce of the nation that any criticism of the miners' attitude was heard. On the second day of the strike, factories commenced to shut down, and the railway companies still further reduced their schedules. One hundred thousand iron workers in Scotland were thrown into idleness even that early by the lack of coal. The tinplate works in Wales found it necessary to suspend operations, and the forty thousand men employed there were thrown out of work. By the fourth day of the strike, the great iron industries of England were practically all paralyzed. Every class in the community had commenced to feel the strike by this time. By the fifth day, about a quarter of a million workers had been dismissed from various industries and the railroad service was generally dislocated and disorganized. Like a creeping paralysis, the stoppage of the coal supply was gradually suspending the whole industrial activity of the nation. The prices of food commenced to climb slowly but surely, and the poorer classes throughout the country began to feel the stringency caused by the strike.

It had been stated before the actual development of the trouble that not only would the miners succeed in paralyzing the manufacturing cities, but, what is of far greater importance to the British Isles, they would cause the suspension of the carrying trade which brings Britain's food from over seas. It is generally estimated that England seldom has more than twelve or fourteen days' food for her population already within her borders. She is entirely dependent upon her colonies and the rest of the world for her supplies, and upon her navy for the protection of that vast fleet which daily comes and goes from her ports. A number of British publications stated that it was the boast of a certain element in the ranks of the strikers that they would within ten days reduce the greatest navy in the world to the utility of scrap-iron, but evidently they had calculated without consideration of Mr. Winston Spencer Churchill, the first Lord of the Admiralty, who announced that during the last month enough coal had been accumulated at the various naval bases to provide adequately for the needs of the fleet for one hundred days.

It is extremely doubtful if any strike has ever exerted such an extremely important international influence as these difficulties in Great Britain. All the nations of Europe have felt the effects in increased prices of coal for domestic and industrial uses. The miners of France and Germany have felt the unrest, and, it is believed, will take advantage of the present most unusual conditions to enforce their demands upon the mine owners. Here in America, though there has as yet been no actual friction between the mine owners and the National Federation of Miners, it is believed that there is sure to be a break on or shortly following the first of April.

The operations of the mines in this country are now being carried on under an agreement between the miners and their employees, which terminates on April 1. The representatives of the various organizations of miners have been conferring recently as to plans for the establishment of a new basis after the expiration of the present agreement. Though it is generally believed that they are anxious to avoid a stoppage of operations if it is possible, the outlook is not particularly bright.

That the independent operators feel the situation to be rather tense was indicated by a meeting which was held in Pottsville, Pa., during February to arrive at some solution of the problem. As far as can be learned, the only outcome of that meeting was a decision to push the work of actual coal production as rapidly as possible, so that in the event of a strike before an agreement is reached, the nation will not find itself suffering from a coal famine. Practically all "dead work," that is, work which is not directly productive of ready coal, has been suspended at the mines, and the miners are confining their efforts to increasing their standing stock. The American miners have already made their demands, but the outstanding difference between their attitude and that of their fellow workers in the old country is that, while they have quite evidently asked more than they expected to receive and have had their demands peremptorily refused, so that negotiations will undoubtedly take place at an early date, the English miners have put their demands in the form of an ultimatum.

It has been stated that in the event of a strike including the men of both the anthracite and bituminous workers, John Mitchell, who led the strikers in the last great anthracite coal strike which America had, will again come forward as the leader of the United Mine Workers of America. Although the demands of the miners for an increase in the rate of pay may be granted, it is agreed by most of the operators that the demands for an eight-hour day and for the installation of a check-off system will not be granted, and unless the miners concede on those points, there is sure to be a strike, and it will probably be a long one.

Capt. R. F. Scott, R.N., in Antarctic Dress

The "Terra Nova," a Typical Exploration Ship, Leaving England

Capt. Roald Amundsen in Polar Furs

South Pole Is Reached At Last!

THOUGH there has never been the same world-wide interest in the discovery of the South Pole as that which absorbed both scientists and laymen until Rear-Admiral Peary's discovery of the North Pole, all the world was set agog on March 6 when rumors began to float about London that Captain Robert F. Scott had reached the goal. The following day reported dispatches from Captain Roald Amundsen, the Norwegian Antarctic explorer, announced that his vessel, the Fram, had reached Hobart, Tasmania, and that he had stated that Captain Scott had succeeded in his attempt to reach the South Pole. Although no confirmatory word was received by Mrs. Scott or by Lieutenant Evans, the London secretary of the Scott Expedition, the news was generally accepted and Captain Scott was given the full credit.

The following morning a dispatch signed "Leon Amundsen," and dated Christiania, Norway, March 7, stated, "I have received the following message: 'Hobart, Tasmania, Thursday, March 7, 1912. Pole attained fourteenth-seventeenth December, 1911. All well. Roald Amundsen.'"

Captain Amundsen headed one of five different expeditions which have been, for several months, struggling toward the South Pole. His chief competitor was Captain Scott, who at first received the credit of the discovery. Captain Scott's expedition was perhaps the best outfitted of any. He went South in the Terra Nova, a ship specially built for use amidst the ice, carrying with him sixty men, a large food supply, a score of Siberian ponies, about thirty dogs and one motor sledge. It was his intention to use the motor sledge in making rapid progress over the comparatively level stretches of the foothills of the great range of mountains that rims the Antarctic Pole.

Captain Amundsen took with him no ponies or motor sledges, but placed his reliance upon one hundred and twelve well-trained Siberian dogs and the skiis upon which he and all his countrymen are so expert. It was his belief that as great speed would be attained in the dash for the pole upon the skiis as could be made in any other way, and the present reports seem to bear out his conclusion. The other competitors in the race are Lieutenant William Filchner, of the general staff of the German Army, Lieutenant N. Shirhase of the Japanese Navy and Dr. Douglas Mawson of Australia. Lieutenant Filchner announced his intention of following as closely as possible the plans of Dr. Frithiof Nansen, and sailed on board his steamer Deutschland on October 5 last year. He is an experienced and daring explorer, having been one of the first to reach Lhassa, in Tibet, and the greatest confidence was felt in his ability by the Geographical Society of Berlin.

The Japanese explorer followed the route established by Sir Ernest Shackleton into Ross Sea, but returned to Sidney, Australia, in 1911 to repair damage done in Terror Bay. It was not until late in November last that he made a second start, so that he was rather behind the others in the race. Dr. Mawson, the Australian, had the advantage of having accompanied Shackleton on his trip, which included the first ascension and exploration of Mount Erebus, and which took them to within one hundred miles of the geographic South Pole. He took his route from the harbor of Hobart, Tasmania, aboard the little ship Aurora, and, it is believed, intended to take the land route to the east of Ross Sea and there pick up Shackleton's former trail.

Captain Scott, who started with his expedition from Port Chalmers, New Zealand, on November 29, 1910, was but a little in advance of Captain Amundsen, who sailed under a commission from King Haakon VII. of Norway and the Norwegian government from Buenos Aires in the Fram toward the close of 1910. He passed through the Straits of Magellan, and then steered for Ross Sea.

Though the dispatches are so meager, Sir Ernest Shackleton, speaking of the feat, says:

"There is no indication in the cable whether Amundsen followed the route of my expedition in reaching the mountains that guard the approach to the Pole. It may be possible that he found a new route and an easier one up to the plateau which lies about 9,000 to 11,000 feet above sea level. He may have had good weather. The words of the cablegram, 'Pole attained, December 14 to 17,' evidently mean that on reaching the geographical pole, so that no uncertainty should exist as to his exact position, he waited three days, taking noon observations so as accurately to determine his position.

"If Captain Amundsen left the Pole on December 17, he would very likely, with a fair wind behind him, return to winter quarters in about forty-five days. We left our 'farthest South,' which was, roughly speaking, 100 miles north of the Pole, on January 9, and reached our winter quarters on February 28. They were 650 geographical miles from the Pole, approximately the same length of journey that Amundsen would have covered from the Pole to his winter quarters, as they were ninety miles farther south than ours.

"We then assume that Captain Amundsen reached Bay of Whales at the end of January. He would take two or three days loading up and getting under way with the Fram. He would then presumably go North and work to the westward of Cape Adare, and then get into the westerly winds and make Hobart, Tasmania.

"The question naturally arises in one's mind, did Captain Scott reach the Pole before December 14? If so, the honor flies with the British flag, but the same endurance, the same skill, and the same meed of endeavor must be granted to Captain Amundsen as the Norwegian people would grant to Captain Scott if the positions were reversed. It would be quite possible that the two expeditions, having reached Beardmore Glacier, would be in touch with each other, or would come across depots which would indicate the advance or return of either party, and if Scott had left a party at the foot of the glacier they would naturally be acquainted with Amundsen's movements, as Amundsen's men would be had Amundsen left a party or depot in the same position. There may have been a more dramatic situation still. The two parties, crossing the glacier and converging toward the coveted spot from different directions, may have met at the pole itself.

"No matter which party reached the Pole first, both will have done much to unveil the mystery of the South and increase the interest and desire for further work in this great unknown continent."

It is impossible as yet to state definitely whether the honor belongs solely to the gallant Norwegian, whether he must share it with his British rival, or relinquish it altogether should Captain Scott effectively prove that he had been at the Pole previous to December 14.

From a geographical, scientific standpoint the discovery of the South Pole, while, of course, a momentous event, had never possessed the same features of importance and danger as relate to the North Pole. The North Pole is afloat; that is, it would be were it not for the ice which is practically solid about it all the year round, while the South Pole, on the other hand, is in the interior of a vast continent that is buried in eternal ice and ribbed with almost impassable mountain ranges. The farthest point of Ross Sea, where Captain Scott debarked his party, and where Captain Amundsen is also supposed to have begun his land journey south, is marked by the great volcano, Mount Erebus, from which rises a great column of steam. It was the ascent and exploration of this volcano, together with the added geographical knowledge which he brought home, that earned Lieutenant Shackleton his knighthood. The locality is one of the most dreaded in the Antarctic regions.

WHOLESALE ARRESTS IN NICARAGUA

—FOOLISH AND INCENDIARY articles in two Nicaraguan journals, intended to stir up feeling against Secretary of State Knox on his arrival at Managua, led to a somewhat extraordinary condition of affairs in that city. The government, knowing that the sentiment of the people as a whole was friendly to Mr. Knox and his mission, and resenting the attempt of a small unfriendly anti-American faction to stir up strife, promptly arrested all connected with the plan—nearly a hundred persons, including the entire staffs of two newspapers. All the Managua newspapers were temporarily suspended during Mr. Knox's visit. Among those sent to jail are Senor Don Francisco Medina, who was Minister of Finance under the deposed President Zelaya; General Mora, who fought under General Estrada, and Senor Salvatierra, who edited an Estrada journal. In a speech at a reception in Congress which was attended by the President, the cabinet, the judges of the Supreme Court and diplomatic corps, the chairman thanked the United States for its attitude and expressed Nicaragua's gratitude for the visit. Mr. Knox made a suitable reply.

The Man Who Would Not Go In

TEXT: "He was angry, and would not go in." Luke 15: 28

JESUS was an unrivaled painter of soul portraits. He held up before his hearers word-pictures of themselves absolutely true to life. His parables are human characters in colors. The story details are the color; the clear truth thus pictured was the telling likeness of the soul life before him, taken by the faithful light of the Word of God.

He had an audience one day in which were very opposite sorts of soul-stuff. In one part were the self-condemned people, as well as being socially condemned. Tax-gatherers—the Matthews and Zaccheuses—and godless folks, so considered, were drawn toward him on that occasion. It was not because he winked at their ways and condoned their lack of virtues. Not one ever supposed that Jesus would sin with them, although he was ready to eat with them.

But at that time there were some of the self-approved people present. The New Testament names them Pharisees and rabbis. They were unrestrained in their criticisms of Jesus. They complained that the man they would like to patronize and appropriate by ranking him with themselves was more willing to rank with the other set.

It was to this other element in his audience that Jesus fitted these three parables: "The Lost—but Recovered—Sheep"; "The Lost—but Recovered Silver Piece"; "The Lost—but Reclaimed—Son." And it was only in the third flash-light revelation of this human heart-life that Jesus turned his truth-telling rays upon the real inner force of the complaining spirits that day, and showed them, and all the world since, how they appear. The elder son in the family of the father and his two boys is the picture of that sort of disposition, that kind of human character, which was meanly and self-justifyingly finding fault with Jesus.

Perhaps no label better fits the man who is like that, than the brief text, "He was angry, and would not go in."

The Man Who Would Not Go In

It will repay us to review our acquaintance with the parable-picture in which this older boy has his setting.

Long religious usage has called it "The Parable of the Prodigal Son." Better naming might be "The Parable of the Loving Father." But for the purpose Jesus had in mind in putting forth the sketch of the elder one of those two sons—I half believe it was the chief purpose of the Master to do just this—yet another title might be given the story, and it might be known as "The Parable of the Ill-Tempered Brother," or "The Parable of the Pious Skinflint."

Just review this part of Luke's story:

> Now his elder son was in the field: and as he came and drew nigh to the house, he heard music and dancing.
> And he called to him one of the servants, and inquired what these things might be.
> And he said unto him, Thy brother is come; and thy father hath killed the fatted calf, because he hath received him safe and sound.
> But he was angry, and would not go in: and his father came out, and entreated him.
> But he answered and said to his father, Lo, these many years do I serve thee, and I never transgressed a commandment of thine: and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends:
> But when this thy son came, which hath devoured thy living with harlots, thou killedst for him the fatted calf.
> And he said unto him, Son, thou art ever with me, and all that is mine is thine.
> But it was meet to make merry and be glad: for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; and was lost, and is found.

There, outside he stays! Look at him! Jesus put him there to be prominently seen and soberly inspected. Let it be hoped that Jesus had no specific case of family skeletons in his mind when he pointed his finger of direction at that pouting, sullen, angered, hateful, jealous, unbrotherly heart—that man who would not go in; but that he is a pictured personification of some human feelings, of some human thoughts, from that day to this, you and I can affirm without qualification. That sort of character, that sort of disposition has not passed off the earth. Professor Henry Drummond lumps the ingredients of such a nature under the one term, "ill-tempered." They are all evil proclivities as he singles them out: "Jealousy, angry pride, uncharity, cruelty, self-righteousness, sulkiness, touchiness, doggedness." If ill-temper is all that, it is an unsavory makeup; and it is all that and something more. It is selfishness in its subtlest essence. It is selfishness that self-deceives. People with ill tempers do not suppose themselves especial sinners on that account. It is set down to some other account than one's own fault.

The Envious Elder Son

The older son, a full-grown man, probably the head of a family of his own, had some excellencies of life. The meanness which marked him can live with some estimable qualities. He was eminently respectable; he was known for industry; he was up early and worked late. I rather suspect him of driving others as he drove himself to "chase the almighty dollar." He had no bad habits and no expensive vices; none at all, shall I say? He was not profane of speech nor lewd in conversation. He was a home-keeper, and was not unmindful of a son's duty to a father growing aged in the old homestead.

The sort of career of his younger and only brother was repulsive to him. It hurt his family pride. He was a thrifty, provident—and I won't withhold the fact—he was a pious man. He had a seat in the synagogue; I feel sure of that. He was much looked to and looked up to in the neighborhood. He was the manager and master in all but name of the big old farm, and it never paid better returns.

What can spoil such a comely character? Only a fault in the secret recesses of the real source of worth. His estimate of and his feelings toward that brother of his, when suddenly revealed, show the keynote of his true self.

He came home from his work toward dark that day: that Great Day. That greatest day for long years to the old father in that old home! The young boy was safe back again! Returning in rags, but now dressed in the best the household had. Barefooted all day and for many a day; now sandaled and being served with a bill of fare such as a chief guest would receive. Even his jewelry had gone into pawn for food; but now its lack is replaced by a fresh gift of his father's observing love. A ring is given him again! The household is high in spirits. The old servants—the happy-hearted, kind-hearted boy had always been a favorite with them—the old servants are all aglow with cordial goodwill and good service.

Selfish Elder-Brotherism

It was a great day! A bright time! Music told its gladness and mirth had its sway. The smell of the special feast preparing fills the atmosphere. Then the firstborn comes up the path. He is tired. He has had a fretful day, and things have not gone sweetly. Somebody had asked him for a contribution for some purely missionary purpose, and he gave something because he had to; but it was not cheerfully subscribed.

The day was an unhappy one, doubtless, and now he is in no mood to be met with that light and liveliness in the old home, so long in the shadow of that wandering brother's absence. "What's the meaning of all this?" He asked one of the servants to explain things. The tone had in it, "How comes such a thing without consulting me?" The servant answers, and he sizes up the temper of his master by the things he tells him, "Thy brother is come!" The man's opinion of his brother is well known by the servants. That bad brother was the constant thorn in his proud flesh. "And thy father hath killed the fatting calf because he hath received him safe and sound." That was too much! "The best calf on the farm; the one he had been saving for a dinner for some of his own friends!" The best on the farm for that beast of a brother! "He was mad." The father was on the lookout for him. He knew what to expect. Human fathers are not such fools, always, as their sons think they are. His father hunted him up and pleaded with him. But the answer was the black stream of gall out of the bitter fountain of that elder brother's heart of hatred. It revealed the measure of his filial reverence; he was serving for what he would get out of it. He had long ago had twice as much as the foolish lad of a brother had misspent. He had the elder son's portion, and his father had given him all that was left. He controlled it all; and he had grown to begrudge his father even the little it took to make some guests welcome.

But to have that disreputable brother be the one in whose honor his best calf was sacrificed! It was too much.

We shall never hear the conclusion of that interview. The parable was not a novel; it was a picture-sermon; it was a photograph of ill-temper and brotherly hate taken in the act. That younger life was sinful; be sure of that; bad, blameworthy. He deserved all the misery he suffered, for he caused misery enough. His repentance was none too soon, nor too sincere.

But Jesus was preaching then, and he preaches yet on the sin of selfish elder-brotherism. The sin of an unforgiving and self-righteous heart! The meanness before high heaven of Pharisaic self-content and self-approval. The sinfulness of a soul who lacks compassion for those that are "out of the way" and are struggling to get back into it! What discord in the pleasure of that feast of welcome that sullen outsider caused! What a contrast to the joy and restfulness of the returned and restored son! The happiness and contentment of his father over his return, and the sulkiness and gloominess and mad bitterness of that elder one "who would not go in!"

The Lesson of Godlike Love

The evil resolution made in hasty anger is one of the hardest to repent of and change.

A continued chapter of the tale could easily be imagined, and it would be a parable too. If that younger brother had known of his brother's sulkiness and suddenly thrown off his robe and resumed his rags and gone out into the darkness to take up again the life of the outcast! It might have been. Alas! It has been, in fact. How many souls have been on the way back to safety and soundness, and the inhospitality of their brothers, the sons of our Father in heaven, has turned them away again into soul darkness and the swinish companionship that at least was willing to share its husks with them.

Drummond says on this theme: "One repulsive Christian will drive away a score of prodigals. God's love for poor sinners is very wonderful; but God's patience with ill-natured saints is a deeper mystery."

Christ had a purpose in painting this elder brother into this parable of divine love and compassion.

He would make us ashamed of ourselves if we caught a glimpse of our own reflection in a mirror! He would make us understand the hatefulness to God of unbrotherliness in man! He would make the bad temper of inhuman self-love so odious to us that our flight to him for its cure would be swift and straight.

"O God, create in me a clean heart and renew a right spirit within me; then, then will I teach transgressors thy way and sinners shall be converted unto thee."

This parable is to teach us the meaning of heavenly, Christlike, Godlike love. It is to teach us what it is by illustrating what the want of it makes of us all: mean, miserable, unmanageable elder sons! To love as God loves—this is to be cured of such wickedness. Do you believe in God's love? Do you know it? Then must you show it. If you receive it and return it, you cannot hate your brothers whose sins against decency make your decent soul to blush.

"Let us love one another, for love is of God," was John's last message. Let us not be angry and refuse to go in where love rules and love forgives and love cures and love makes life pure.

HEAVEN BELOW

THEY talk about a Better Land,
And of its glories sing;
But if to Christ we give ourselves,
We heaven to earth may bring.

Celestial joys we here may find,
And heavenly peace may know;
Yes, foretastes of that holy place
We may enjoy below.

Then let us live so close to Christ
That we may know his love,
And make our heaven while here below,
Nor wait for one above.

A Living Sacrifice

IN a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Rev. John Perkins, missionary at Barobo, Cape Palmas, West Africa, tells this interesting incident:

Several months ago, we began to make an effort to teach our mission family of fifty boys and girls to bring offerings for the Lord to our Sunday morning service, to be used in spreading the Gospel in this and in other lands. As they had no money, we allowed them value for any useful thing they might bring from their boxes or from the bush. The first three collections consisted of the following articles: thread, brooches, rings, pins, sugar, soap, green frogs, peas, rice, palm-cabbage, and a little money amounting to $2.74.

One evening, while we were having special services, a boy named Amos, from a heathen town, arose and testified, with a beaming face, that the Lord had saved him. Last Saturday I called Amos, with others, and asked him why he thought he was saved. He said: "I have love in my heart for Jesus and for all the people." Amos was baptized in a small stream nearby with four others.

At our eleven o'clock service, after the others had brought their small gifts, Amos quietly arose from his seat, came forward, took the plate from the table, placed it on the mud floor; then placing both of his bare black feet into the plate, stood upright in it, and after looking us missionaries square in the eyes, without a smile stepped out of the plate, and after placing it again on the table, quietly returned to his seat. After service, Brother Harrow called Amos and asked him what he meant by stepping into the collection plate so. He replied: "I had nothing else to give to God, so I gave myself."

We had read of similar occurrences, but to have one of these raw heathen boys give us such a clear, definite exhibition of consecration and sacrifice touched our hearts very deeply. Amos is about twelve years of age, and is quiet and unassuming. We ask THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers to pray for him and for all of our people, that we may withhold nothing from Him who is more than worthy of all our love and praise and service.

I gave my life for thee:
My precious blood I shed,
That thou might'st ransomed be,
And quickened from the dead.
I gave my life for thee:
What hast thou given for me?

Train the Heart and Conscience

By Rev. Richard Braunstein

THE education of the rising generation is a matter of vital importance to both church and State.

An intellectual and secular education is not sufficient to secure the welfare or safety of society. Rome had more intelligence and culture when she fell than when she was in her prime. The shaggy demons of the wilderness who trampled out her civilization were more moral than her citizens. The golden age of Grecian and Roman culture and civilization was that of foulest corruption and impending destruction. The fine sense of beauty has no necessary connection with duty, and the grammatical declensions of virtue have no connection with its practice. Education may create most accomplished rogues and dangerous neighbors. It is said that after Russia had tried secular education for a while, her prime minister said to the Czar, "We are raising a race of demons."

THE tree of the knowledge of good and evil in Paradise brought in the devil's millennium. Knowledge of good and evil affords no assurance of a greater love of the one, or of a greater hatred of the other, than would exist in ignorance. Our first parents no doubt found the devil well enough informed. The archangel Michael and the archdevil Lucifer may have the same intellectual ability and the same intellectual attainments, but the fidelity of the one and the disobedience of the other make heaven and hell. Unless knowledge ripens the moral force it becomes the tool of selfishness and sin. Corrupted intelligence is worse than misled ignorance. Knowledge perverted is misused power. Give the printing press to vicious men and they will only do harm with it.

There is to-day a superstitious faith in spelling-books. Men who ought to know better will tell you, with census tables and statistics of all kinds in hand, that ignorance is the cause of crime. Ignorance is only one of many concomitants of crime. Intelligence is another. And knowledge is a third. It is purely a random inference of careless writers that because ignorance and crime are often together, therefore ignorance is the cause of crime. We must educate the moral and religious nature by the Word of God. We cannot make children honest by teaching them the multiplication table, nor virtuous by teaching them grammar, nor benevolent by teaching them geography. There is no logical connection whatever between a secular education and a good character. To make men and women moral we must educate the moral nature on the basis of revealed religion.

WASHINGTON said: "Religion and morality are the essential pillars of civil society." And again: "Virtue or morality is the necessary spring of popular government. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education upon minds of a peculiar structure, reason and experience forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious liberty."

The Word of God furnishes the only valid sanctions of sound morality. If we reject or neglect this and rely on the unperverted instincts of human nature, as well close our schools and wait for some Cæsar with his drawn sword for a scepter. Great populations, especially when congested in cities, must either be trained to the liberty of the Gospel or be ruled by a tyrant. Where God and his will are not known and acknowledged, no imperative motives can be found to make men noble and good.

THE mass of men who believe they are to die like dogs will live like dogs. Says John Stuart Mill: "If a man prefers to be a contented pig, we should have no positive reason for telling him so, and even if we told him, we should have no means of convincing him." And can such persons be qualified to maintain civil order and free institutions? "Unless morality is rooted in a reverent love of God, it will be driven before the sudden gusts of temptation like rattling autumn leaves before winter winds." If it looks upon religion as the best chief of police merely, and not as the interpreter of everlasting verities, it must of necessity be destitute of force. Short of the willing sacrifice of self to the righteous claims of God, and the cheerful movement of the mind within the limits of a supreme law, there is no pure or durable morality. Religion is the root of which the purest morality is the flower. The flower cannot exist without the root, and the root cannot exist and have vitality without the inflorescence in morality.

Our Christian education and evangelism, to be most effective, must begin with the young.

It was a very suggestive statement, that of Disraeli when he said: "It is a glorious thing to see a State saved by her youth."

Statesmen tell us that we must stop raising rogues, if we would get rid of the race.

Christian education should begin with the dawn of existence, and predominate through the whole course of education. "First, midst and last," we should teach "what man is to believe concerning God and what duty God requires of man."

As eternity surpasses time in importance, so does this surpass all other knowledge. If our children are trained in secular schools and grow up godless, our boasted science will soon shine like an electric light over a moral graveyard. We must begin from the first to train the heart and conscience along with the intellect.

Poems Everybody Should Know

The Land o' the Leal

I'M WEARIN' awa', John,
Like snaw-wreaths in thaw, John,
I'm wearin' awa'
To the land o' the leal.
There's nae sorrow there, John,
There's neither cauld nor care, John,
The day's aye fair
I' the land o' the leal.

Our bonnie bairn's there, John,
She was baith gude and fair, John,
And, oh! we grudged her sair
To the land o' the leal.
But sorrow's sel' wears past, John,
And joy's comin' fast, John,
The joy that's aye to last
In the land o' the leal.

Sae dear's that joy was bought, John,
Sae free the battle fought, John,
That sinfu' man e'er brought
To the land o' the leal.
Oh! dry your glist'ning ee, John,
My saul langs to be free, John,
And Angels beckon me
To the land o' the leal.

Oh, haud ye leal and true, John,
Your day it's wearin' thro', John,
An' I'll welcome you
To the land o' the leal.
Now fare ye weel, my ain John,
This world's cares are vain, John,
We'll meet and aye be fain
I' the land o' the leal.

—LADY NAIRNE (1766-1845.)

Lady Nairne, the author of this song, was born in 1766 and died in 1845. Amongst Scottish song writers, she is excelled in genuine poetic feeling and sprightliness only by Robert Burns. Amongst her other works are the following songs, well known to every Scotchman: "The Hundred Pipers," "Bonnie Charlie's Noo Awa'," "Caller Herrin," "Who'll be King but Charlie," "The Laird of Cockpen," and "John Tod."

The First Music Lesson

A RELUCTANT little girl, uncomfortably perched on a spinnet stool, finds her first music lesson very dull indeed. The streak of sunshine on the floor beneath the instrument attracts her attention much more than do the notes in the book before her. From the somewhat coy expression and naive manner displayed by the little lady, one is inclined to believe that in spite of the old professor's kindly persuasion she will in another moment slip from the uninviting cushion, and gathering up her hat from the hassock near by, fly away into the sunshine to play.

"The First Music Lesson" is one of a series of typical childhood experiences that the artist Muenier, a favorite painter of the Barbazon group in France, has delightfully portrayed. The original painting is in the Luxembourg gallery in Paris. The artist died scarcely ten years ago.

MY BATTLEFIELD

THE large report of fame I lack,
And shining clasps and crimson scars,
For I have held my bivouac
Alone amid the untroubled stars.

My battlefield has known no dawn
Beclouded by a thousand spears;
I've been no mounting tyrant's pawn
To buy his glory with my tears.

It never seemed a noble thing
Some little leagues of land to gain
From broken men, nor yet to fling
Abroad the thunderbolts of pain.

Yet I have felt the quickening breath
As peril heavy peril kissed;
My weapon was a little faith,
And fear was my antagonist.

Not a brief hour of cannonade,
But many hours of bitter strife,
Till God of his great mercy laid
Across my brow the leaves of life.

RIOT AND PILLAGE AT PEKING

DISAPPOINTMENT and dismay are felt everywhere over the unexpected and widespread renewals of disorder in China. While preparations were being made for a great lantern parade at Peking in honor of the delegates from the Republican Assembly at Nanking who had come to invite Yuan Shi Kai to proceed to the southern capital and assume the presidency, a terrific riot broke out which soon assumed alarming proportions and was answered by similar uprisings in many cities and provinces.

The most reasonable explanation of the rioting is that the soldiers were impatient because of delayed and insufficient payment for their services. The movement does not seem to represent an effort of the Manchus to be returned to power, although the Manchu police in Peking are reported to have made no serious effort to quell the disturbance. Many natives were killed by the rioters, shops were looted, particularly the shops where jewels and other valuables were on sale, and disastrous fires kindled. The damage to property by the Peking fires was estimated at $15,000,000. In Tientsin alone the fire loss is estimated at $6,000,000. There was great excitement at the legations and other foreign residences while the riot was raging at Peking, but practically all the foreigners were soon safely guarded in the legation quarter. No injury or loss of life was reported among the missionaries or other foreigners, with the exception of Dr. Schreeter, a German physician at Tientsin, who was reported on March 3 to have been killed. Mr. Willard D. Straight, formerly American consul-general at Mukden, was residing at Peking with his wife, who is a daughter of the late William C. Whitney. They were compelled to seek protection at the legation, leaving their handsome residence to the mercy of the looters. British and American officers offered escorts and guards to the missionaries in the danger zone.

For the most part, however, foreigners have not been molested. The leaders of the mutiny issued orders to this effect and they are being heeded. It is necessarily a time of deep anxiety for the missionaries and their friends. Dr. John W. Wherry, in charge of the Presbyterian Mission at Peking, cabled on March 3: "Safe. Not much cause for alarm."

A report was current that at Hwanghsien imperial troops beheaded forty Christian converts, saying that they were "practically rebels," but it is hardly likely that this report will be confirmed.

The powers have been at a loss to find a way of assisting the troubled country. The chief necessity seems to be for money with which to pay the mutinous soldiers; but it is difficult to find bankers who are willing to invest money in a country whose future is so uncertain. There are altogether about 5,700 foreign troops which could be quickly concentrated at Peking if necessity arose. The Fifteenth United States Infantry and the Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers of the British Army are on the firing line, ready to assist in preserving peace. There has been some rumor that Dr. Sun Yat Sen, the provisional president of the new republic, might proceed northward and make Peking the headquarters of the Republican army and the Assembly. He has already consented that Peking be retained as the capital of China, and recent dispatches to Washington indicate that he is willing to transfer the seat of government promptly. The whole situation is made more complex by the rumor that Marquis Chu Chêng Yu, a lineal descendant of the Ming Emperor Wan Leih, is inaugurating a movement to seize the government and restore the Ming imperial dynasty. The statement is made that an old prophecy declared that the Mings would recover the throne in 1913. This movement, backed by superstition, will add to the complexity of the situation, but there is probably no serious likelihood that the movements of Marquis Chu will assume grave proportions.

Contributions for China's Orphans Received Since Last Acknowledgment

FROM every part of the country, friends of the China orphans are sending in their gifts to provide for the support of the 700 little native boys and girls for whom THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is making appeal. Doubtless the missionaries will be greatly encouraged when they learn of the splendid response that is being made to their call for assistance. A great opportunity is presented for Churches, Sunday Schools, Christian Endeavor Societies, Epworth Leagues, Young People's Unions, Bible Classes and other organizations to do effective work in helping these little Chinese waifs to the care and protection of a Christian home. Amid all the troubles in that country, our missionaries have faithfully stood by the children.

All contributions for the cause should be addressed CHINA FAMINE ORPHAN FUND, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

A Curtiss Hydroaeroplane

Towing After an Accident

IF MISS LIBERTY felt any resentment at the invasion of the upper air of New York harbor over which she and her torch have reigned supreme, she did not show it—or at least Mr. Frank Coffyn and a photographer who accompanied him on one of his recent hydroaeroplane flights said that at close quarters the lady of Liberty looked as serene and undisturbed as usual. Some of the throng of folks who lined the Battery wall seemed waiting for the bronze girl to crane her neck with the rest to see the aviator and his queer machine as they circled 1,500 feet above her tiara; but, doomed to disappointment, they devoted their attention to assisting the steam whistles of the river and harbor craft in noisy applause of the feat.

For two days, February 18 and 19, Mr. Coffyn kept all the harbor on the lookout for his bird-boat, and listening for the hum of its motors. He was subjecting the newest type of Curtiss hydroaeroplane to the severest testing that any air craft had yet received. There was a great deal of floating ice in the river and harbor and it was to prove that the new type of machine is capable of operating over rough and icy waters, taking to the air at will, that the experiments were conducted. When the silvery twin propellers of the amphibious machine were started to whirring, the upcurving bows of the ship turned up two glistening furrows of spray for a few seconds, and then she started mounting, heading toward Governors Island. Within a minute she was more than one hundred feet above the surface of the bay. Tug whistles screamed and the municipal ferryboat Manhattan, bound for Staten Island and filled with passengers, roared a salute.

Mr. Coffyn said he was going to circle the air above Liberty, and the multitude fastened their eyes on his ship as it walked up the sky. The sun, a bronze blur through the mist, seemed to be his destination for a time. Within five minutes from the moment she left the water, at 4:15 o'clock, she was beyond the statue, toward the Jersey shore, looking no bigger to spectators than a gull. Coming back, Mr. Coffyn looped the space that Miss Liberty might have occupied if she had grown up a bit, and then sailed back toward the Battery.

When he planed down to the point whence he had sailed, he had been away just ten minutes and thirty-five seconds. It was thought he was going to take the photographer aboard, but he decided to make another flight and rested on the water only four seconds. Then he rode the air again much as if he were going up an invisible toboggan slide. He cut curlycues within easy range of the spectators for four minutes and five seconds, and came down.

The photographer was now rowed out to the ship and got aboard with the help of the skipper. With the additional weight she made the ascent rather slowly and at a longer angle, heading toward Governors Island. A few seconds later she changed her course, and rising rapidly to more than 700 feet, made for the Jersey shore south of Liberty, dwindling to a mere sparrowlike speck in the gray air. She circled Liberty again, this time less than 100 feet above the level of the bay.

Mr. Coffyn was altogether eleven minutes forty-seven and two-fifths seconds in the air before he alighted on the water, approaching it in a long, gradual descent, as he considered it unwise to cut up capers with a passenger aboard.

By combining the aeroplane with a simple form of water-borne craft in the new hydroaeroplane, an advance of the first importance has been made in air navigation. The new craft is by far the safest of all aeroplanes, while comparing favorably in speed qualities with other models. The new American invention places aeronautics on a much more practical basis than ever before, and has given a great stimulus to the commercial development of the art. Within a few weeks a company has been incorporated to maintain a regular service for carrying mail and passengers between New York and Albany by hydroaeroplane. The transcontinental flyer, Calbraith Rodgers, is meanwhile even planning a transatlantic flight by means of an enlarged machine of this type.

The principle of the new air craft is extremely simple. The machine consists of a familiar type of biplane mounted on a light, serviceable float or boat, the whole being driven by air propellers. It is thus possible for the hydroaeroplane to skim rapidly over the water like an ordinary hydroplane, or to rise high in the air. It can sail into the air either from the land or water, while on descending it may land equally well on either element. The powerful air propellers will drive it over the surface of the water at a speed of forty miles an hour or better, while aloft it is capable of a speed of seventy-five miles an hour.

In the newer models of the hydroaeroplane the engines and much of the controlling machinery are carried on two small pontoons suspended beneath the planes. The pilot sits comfortably on his seat above them whether navigating the air or the water. The hydroaeroplane is driven by either one or two air propellers of conventional form. The biplane model lends itself especially to the purpose because of its stability, while its steadiness is still further increased by horizontal planes both before and behind the main planes. The method used for controlling these planes to meet the varying air conditions is much the same as in the ordinary aeroplane. The frame carrying the wings is built of bamboo and steel. The hydroaeroplanes now in actual use carry one or two passengers in addition to a reservoir holding sufficient fuel for a flight of upwards of ten hours. A larger machine has been designed for carrying, besides the pilot, a mechanician, and fuel for twenty-four hours.

The hydroaeroplane may be launched into the air by the simple method of sliding down a wire, thus leaving the ground within a few feet. The wire ropes are stretched taut at an acute angle, and the machine balanced at the top of the chute. When the propellers are set in motion the air craft is released, and the momentum gained from sliding down the wire, added to the push of the propellers, serves to lift it without its touching the ground or the water as the case may be. This method does away with the cumbersome and expensive starting devices used by many aviators. One of the great advantages of the plan is that the hydroaeroplane may thus be made to rise from the deck of a ship with little preparation. The construction of an ordinary starting platform on shipboard is scarcely practicable.

It is believed that the hydroaeroplane will prove invaluable in connection with marine navigation. Since the air craft may be folded up into comparatively small space, a number of them may readily be carried on an ordinary ship or a war vessel. To launch them it will only be necessary to string guide wires from the masts to the sides of the ship, the work of but a few minutes. The hydroaeroplanes to carry important mail or dispatches may be dispatched with comparative ease. On returning from their journeys the hydroaeroplanes may come to rest in the water alongside and be quickly hoisted on deck.

The greatest advantage of the combined air and water going craft is the opportunity it affords the pilot of making repairs in over-water flights in case anything goes wrong. Should the engine stop suddenly or any part of the machinery get out of order, it is a comparatively simple matter for the pilot to volplane to the surface of the water, and while floating safely, get out the necessary tools and make repairs. With everything once more shipshape the hydroaeroplane may again be driven into the air.

Turbulent Times in Mexico

MATTERS in Mexico up to March 6 remained in a state of utmost chaos. It was even impossible to be sure on which side of the present altercation some of the most prominent generals were lined up. It was something almost new in the history of war correspondence to have dispatches coming in which were almost unintelligible because at this end it could not be determined on which side the generals were fighting. Further dispatches indicated almost as much uncertainty on the firing line.

Rebel troops proceeded from Juarez to Chihuahua and on March 3 attacked the town, whose garrison was commanded by General Orozco. Later reports declared that the general had deserted to the rebels. They were at first doubtful of his sincerity, but later made him generalissimo of all the rebel forces in the State. The headquarters of the revolutionists are at Chihuahua, and they announce that an army of 5,000 will proceed against Mexico City.

On March 2, President Taft issued a proclamation warning all American citizens in Mexico to refrain from taking any part in the hostilities, and advising those residing in the localities affected by the disturbances to leave. Fifty-three Americans were cut off at Torreon in the early stage of the disturbances. Great anxiety was felt for their safety, but it was learned at length that a force of rural guards had taken them under protection on February 29.

Sowing and Reaping

AFTER a nation-wide campaign, covering months of earnest effort, the Men and Religion Forward Movement is about to transfer its activities to New York. We have everywhere heard glowing accounts of the excellent results accomplished in different parts of the country by this phenomenal work, which is recognized as differing from all previous revivals in several important details. Few if any of the old methods familiar in the revivals of the past were followed. Emotional appeals to the heart and the conscience, the pressing home of the vital question of accepting Christ as Saviour, the open confession of him before men, the testimony of the lips, the inquiry room, the solemn pledges, and the enrolment of converts—these were all precious adjuncts of the revivals of former days and were regarded as helpful means of grace and blessing.

But though "the old order changeth," and time-honored measures must give place to new and modern ones, the message of God's love and grace is ever the same. So, while the new movement has brought in new methods, it has faithfully promulgated the old Gospel and held up the Cross of Christ as the hope of the nation and the world. On moral, sociological and humanitarian lines, it has done much that should bear fruit hereafter. Wherever its workers have penetrated, there has been felt an uplifting influence, and the simple, straightforward, businesslike presentation of the claims of religion has stirred many communities, energized churches and religious organizations, and brought good men into closer relationship.

In this wonderfully vigorous campaign—which has been the business man's conception of the presentation of vital truth, and also of the proper organization of religious forces—public interest will naturally focus on the results accomplished. We cannot agree with President Finley that the results will be "intangible." Wherever the Gospel seed has been sown, there will come a harvest-time. There are doubtless many who would have wished to hear that more of the old and tried evangelists had been identified with the campaign—the men whose names have been familiar household words in times of revival. But the new method, while it eliminated the emotional, has not overlooked the spiritual, and we shall hope to hear of a full and fruitful harvest of souls as the result of the labors of the Men and Religion Forward Movement, and of a splendid impetus being given to the church of God throughout the land.

Taxing the Press

ONE of the clearest and most convincing presentations of the postal rate question is that published in the Philadelphia North American. Our contemporary recalls the fact that a year ago nearly all the newspapers united in strong but unreasoning approval of the administration's proposition to penalize the periodical press by a totally unnecessary advance of postal rates, with the adjuncts of separate weighing and carriage rates for advertising and fiction pages. At that time, the newspaper point of view seemed to be that the magazines and periodicals were their competitors and consequently deserved penalization for that reason alone, if no other. Now, however, the shoe is on the other foot, since President Taft and Postmaster-General Hitchcock, in formulating their latest scheme for taxing the press, have bunched the entire line of American newspapers together with the magazines. Now the newspapers are beginning, though somewhat tardily, to perceive the rank injustice of it. Our post office last year cleared a profit of $219,000 and its revenues will be vastly augmented when the parcels post plan goes into operation, so that any tax on publications of the country could not be defended on the ground of revenue necessity. Besides, as the North American points out, the investigating commission did not touch the root of the matter at all, but worked on a single prescribed line, taking in one class of mail. President Taft, disregarding the fact that Congress quietly shelved his measure a year ago, now returns to the charge with a still more punitive scheme to double the postal rate upon the carriage of all the 2,472 daily newspapers, the 16,269 weeklies and the 2,769 monthlies, although he knows thoroughly well that the financial conditions of the Post Office Department are such as to make this tax totally unnecessary. We believe there are men of sufficient penetration in Congress to see the drift of this absurd adventure, which conveys a strange reminder both of the Knight of La Mancha's tilt against the windmills and of the historic occasion when Cæsar Augustus decreed that all the world should be taxed.

Laying a Bogy

IT HAS been well said that one-half the world is slave to fear, and most of the other half to habit. We talk glibly enough of the passing of old superstitions and of the spread of enlightenment; yet there are not a few time-honored habits, beliefs, bogies—call them what you will—to which we cling with all the tenacity of a heathen Chinese to his joss or an African to his juju. One of these is that chimera of our unreasoning fears, the Presidential year bogy, threadbare and frayed at the edges from long service, which we trot out quadrennially and set up, as though it were a verity to be treated with great consideration. This is the national idol of pessimism, whose chief office is the prediction of "bad business" as the inevitable accompaniment of every Presidential year. The best way to treat this ancient bugaboo is to knock it clean off its pedestal and consign it to the junkshop. With good crops, sound conditions everywhere and common sense in the direction of affairs, there is nothing to justify untoward industrial or commercial results, no matter how the election goes. That all such apprehensions in the past have been founded on delusion is so satisfactorily proved by commercial statistics that the wonder is that business men did not long ago utterly reject the Presidential year bogy and all his gloomy predictions. We suppose, however, that the only explanation is that it takes most people—even hard-headed business men—the greater part of a lifetime to find out that "the worst things are those that never happen."

Amazonian Suffragettes

ONCE more the wing of the English suffragettes known as the "Violent Sisterhood" has distinguished itself by going on a window-smashing rampage. Determined to distinguish themselves in a manner that would attract public attention to their claims of political equality, the women, under the leadership of Mrs. Pankhurst, Mrs. Tukes and Mrs. Marshall, went in carriages and afoot, carrying hammers and stones and breaking windows by wholesale. There were even threats of attacking the museums and the palaces. Some two hundred women were arrested and arraigned in the various police courts, for damage done to plate glass in the shopping streets. The three leaders were sentenced to two months' imprisonment and a number of others to terms in jail ranging from two weeks upward. Some of the worst offenders may get much longer terms. In Holloway jail, where over a hundred of these indomitable spirits were penned, they amused themselves by smashing the prison windows and shouting for Mrs. Pankhurst. One gentle being reached fame at a bound by attempting to set a branch post office on fire with shavings and paraffin. Of course, these ladies, who seem determined to fight their way into public recognition and win "votes for women" at any cost, do not represent the sentiments of British women as a whole, for the actions of the Violent Sisterhood have been repudiated by the conservative leaders of the movement in England, who hold that by such undesirable notoriety they damaged the cause immeasurably. It is certainly a strange and unexpected political development which brings women of education and refinement to the front as the reckless champions of disorder.

Send for Your Roses—Now

SOME one who dearly loved roses called them "the smiles of God's goodness"; and the simile was not inappropriate. Our handsome colored insert in the issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of February 28 has struck a chord of loud appreciation among our subscribers. Perhaps the two most popular offers it describes are those of the Climbing American Beauty Rose and the Collection of Eight Roses. The Climbing American Beauty Rose is, we believe, one of the most wonderful developments produced in rose-culture in recent years. It is a cross between an unnamed seedling of climbing habits and the grand old American Beauty. One plant of this new rose will produce twenty times as many blooms in June as the old American Beauty. One of our staff made a special trip to Westchester, Pa., where this rose was first grown, and saw the parent rose and its descendants covering great trellises, twelve to fourteen feet high. The rich, dark green, glossy foliage, with the great masses of deep, brilliant-hued roses, creates probably the most striking floral effect ever seen. You may have just such magnificent effects about your own porch or trellis and we know you will be delighted beyond measure with its brilliancy and fragrance. The collection of Eight Roses, including the Climbing Baby Rambler and the wonderful Black Rose, is one which makes up a well-balanced group, a most desirable attraction in any garden. All the selections were picked out with the view of having a rich variety of color and hardy, strong-growing bushes, suited to any climate. Some of the roses in this collection bloom very early in the season, others a little more slowly and some quite late, so that with this group you can count on having roses in bloom almost the entire season. Whether it be the delicate flesh-tinted lovely Maman Cochet, or the superb and delicious red La France, you are sure of having some varieties to please any taste. For these reasons we believe the two Rose Offers are the most popular. Judging by the way orders are coming in, we shall shortly use up the entire stock reserved for us. As we do not wish to disappoint any of our subscribers, we now remind them that our Rose and Plant Offer closes March 30. If you have not already done so, send in your order now, or at the very latest before March 31, so that you may not be disappointed.

General Notes

—THE GENERAL ARBITRATION TREATIES with Great Britain and France were ratified by the Senate on March 7. They were so amended, however, as to be useless. The provision for a Joint High Commission was stricken out, and certain questions were declared not arbitrable. It is the general opinion that the treaties have been so mutilated that they will not now be submitted to France and England for ratification, but will simply be pigeonholed, for the time at least.

—WE HAVE received a letter from Missionary V. G. Plymire, of Hankow, China, containing the welcome news that the report of the probable killing of Miss Christina Anderson, Scandinavian Missionary at Sian, Shensi, and of the murder of the postmaster, was fortunately an exaggerated rumor, due doubtless to the great disturbances at the time of the riots. Both the postmaster and Miss Anderson were well at last accounts. The rumor of their death came to this country in a letter to the Rev. W. H. Hagqvist, Scandinavian Missionary of Sian, now here on furlough.

Knox Visits Caribbean America

SECRETARY KNOX at the request of President Taft is visiting the countries of Caribbean America. While his visit is a vacation trip rather than an official one, it still will have in it much of interest and benefit to the sister republics and to our own. Several years ago Mr. Root, then Secretary of State, made his trip around South America with great benefit to those South American countries, bringing about a better understanding and feeling between their nations and our own, and opening up the way for commercial relations so long and sadly neglected. It is expected that the visit of Mr. Knox will do a similar work for our Central American neighbors. When the great canal at Panama is completed the American republics surrounding the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf of Mexico will come into vastly increased trade relationship to the United States, and should be brought into closer political sympathy with us. The canal will emphasize the privilege and necessity of comprehending and maintaining the Monroe Doctrine. The visiting party includes Secretary and Mrs. Knox, Hugh Knox and wife, Philander Knox, Jr., and wife, Lieutenant Commander Stickt, naval aide, and Captain Clayton, military aide. Captain Hughes commands the cruiser Washington, which conveys the party. Telegrams have already told of cordial receptions at Colon, Panama; San José, Costa Rica; and in Nicaragua. Mr. Knox's Panama speech was printed in the San José newspapers and all the editors made friendly comment and welcomed our representative. The presidents and officials of the governments and the masses of the people are giving Secretary Knox the royal reception which was to have been expected. The universal prayer of the republics of North, Central, and South America seems to be that of the psalmist:

Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces. (Ps. 122:7.)

A Singular Rescue

THE three-year-old child of Albert Stepp, living two miles from Canton, Texas, fell feet foremost in a thirteen-inch bored well sixty feet deep. By the use of a mirror the child could be seen, and the little fellow was constantly crying and calling to his grandpa to come and get him. The grandparents and parents were wild with excitement, and overcome with grief at their inability to afford immediate succor. Forty or fifty men and women were soon gathered, all anxious to get a loop over the child to draw it out, but with no avail. A negro boy twelve years old was let down, and getting the child by the sleeve both were drawn up half way. The sleeve gave way and the child fell back to the bottom. All were horror-stricken for fear the fall would certainly kill the child. Then they tied a rope to the leg of the negro boy and let him down head first. He put the loop of a rope about the child's body, and then the two were drawn out separately. The miraculous part of the incident is that the child was only bruised a little and not seriously injured. This incident calls to mind the recovery of the prophet Jeremiah from the well in the bottom of the royal prison by an Ethiopian, described at length in Jeremiah 38:

So they drew up Jeremiah with cords, and took him up out of the dungeon: and Jeremiah remained in the court of the prison. (Jer. 38: 13.)

Banner Year for Births

ACCORDING to the statistics just given out by the Department of Health for New York City 134,542 babies were born in the city during the year 1911. This is the largest percentage of births since accurate records were kept, and the present method of recording births is held to be almost 100 per cent. efficient. On the basis of a population of 4,983,385, the city last year had a birth record of one to every thirty-six of its population. There was an average of one child born in a little more than three minutes through the year. This news will be a surprise and a pleasant one as well. It is likely that the large foreign element in the population has had much to do with this record birth rate. It is a pathetic fact, however, that these dear little ones have such a hard fight for their lives. Fortunately society is adopting better methods for the preservation of the babies that come to bless the world.

Lo, children are a heritage of the Lord. (Ps. 127: 3.)

Surprised with Three Millions

CHARLES H. TUNLEY, of Brooklyn, N. Y., met a man by the name of Harry Hamilton, of England, by accident in a New York office building the other day, who coolly notified him that three million dollars had been left to him by will. Twenty-seven years ago Tunley's father was walking in the street in Boston when he was startled by the cries of a woman in distress. Rocking violently from side to side as it bounced over the road, a carriage with three female occupants dashed along the thoroughfare drawn by a frightened horse. The young man, without a moment's hesitation or thought of himself, leaped at the bridle of the horse, and though dragged along at the peril of his life, he pulled the horse down on his haunches. The women were assisted to the street badly frightened but unhurt. These women were Mrs. Elizabeth Woodbridge, Mrs. Jane Hooper and Miss Mary Brown, sisters, and daughters of wealthy parents. Some years ago the hero rescuer died, leaving his son Charles ignorant of the lives he had undertaken to save. In 1905, Mrs. Woodbridge, who had moved to England with her sister, died. Before another year the other two sisters rescued followed her, leaving an immense estate in Elford, Essex, England. Harry Hamilton was named as executor, and upon reading the wills he learned that, aside from a few gifts to charity, the entire fortune was bequeathed to Charles A. Tunley. The young millionaire-to-be was asked what he intended to do, now that he was rich. "I am going to keep right on with my law studies," he said. "I have been taking a law course at night and have always hoped that some day I would become a prominent practitioner. I am sure I will now. My one big idea, however, is to prepare a home for my wife and child befitting their present circumstances. I think I shall also go into some business, probably real estate. This whole thing came as a surprise to me. I have been having a pretty hard fight with the world lately, but I guess everything will be clear sailing now." Besides Charles Tunley, his three brothers and stepmother come into large fortunes by the will. Every unselfish act has some kind of reward sooner or later. The undying gratitude of these women for their rescue by this hero suggests gratitude to Christ, who has saved us, and done so at the sacrifice of his own life.

Who gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us from this present evil world, according to the will of God and our Father. (Gal. 1: 4.)

More Rembrandts for America

IT IS understood that two Rembrandt paintings recently sold in Berlin are to come to America. Our country is to be congratulated on the fact. The following estimate given by Edmondo de Amicis of Rembrandt's great genius will find a response in the hearts of the lovers of art in this country: "Born in a windmill, rising unheralded, without master, without examples, without any derivation from schools, he became a universal painter, embraced all the aspects of life, painted figures, landscapes, marine views, animals, saints in paradise, patriarchs, heroes, monks, wealth and misery, deformity and decrepitude, the ghetto, the tavern, the hospital, death; made, in short, a review of heaven and earth, and rendered all things visible by a light from the arcana of his own imagination." One of the two pictures America is expected to receive is that of a beautiful boy, such as few painters ever did or could paint. But the more important of the two is a masterpiece and represents the "Presentation of Christ at the Temple." Into this he has poured all the wealth of his religious nature and has reached the climax of artistic genius. By the magic touches of his brush he has brought heaven down to earth and has lifted earth up to heaven and made them one. The greatest painters have painted their masterpieces from sacred subjects, and of these the most universally beloved have been those which have been irradiated by Christ's life and love. Luke has graphically described the presentation of Jesus in the temple for the fulfilment of the ceremonial law, including mention of the beautiful characters of Simeon and Anna, and then says:

When they had performed all things according to the law of the Lord, they returned into Galilee, to their own city Nazareth. (Luke 2: 39.)

Heart on Right Side

MISS MARGARET BRILL applied for treatment at the Tuberculosis Dispensary in Yonkers, N. Y., recently, and it was found that her heart was on the right side, which is the wrong side as nature usually arranges it. It is sometimes the case that in pleurisy the heart is pushed out of its place, but cases are rare where the heart is on the wrong side at birth. The physical heart is the symbol of the affections, social and moral, which we call the heart, where character dwells and out of which flow the tides of moral and spiritual life. It is not the uncommon thing to find men and women whose hearts are on the wrong side, devoted to material things, to this world, its follies and its sins. Fortunately there are many whose hearts are on the right side, the one toward their fellowmen and toward God and toward immortality, in obedience to the command:

Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth. (Col. 3: 2.)

BOB'S BABIES

BY HELEN COALE CREW

TROUBLESOME is not much of a place, but you will find it on any large map of Colorado. There is one house there, a stable, and a barn. In the house is a post office, in the stable some half-dozen splendid horses, in the barn a cow or two. But helping Old Kincaid with the mail, or riding bareback over the limitless mesas, or fishing knee-deep in Troublesome Creek, there is Jess. Always and everywhere, Jess; with her clear eyes and cloudy hair and sturdy limbs and warm heart.

Troublesome lies about half-way between Kremmling and Hot Sulphur, speaking in terms of post offices, and about midway between the Berthoud and Sheephorn Passes, speaking in terms of the splendid hills that rise into heaven's blue on every side. A lonely place, where in a day's ride you would meet no one, or in a week's walk—but, then, no one ever walks. No, indeed! Certainly not Jess!

One hot forenoon in August Jess, standing in the doorway, heard the angry squeak of wooden brakes against wheels, and presently saw at the brow of the hill beyond the house a covered wagon and team, approaching in a cloud of dust. She watched its slow approach with speculative eye. In this silent world no ripple was too small to have an interest.

"More homesteaders, I guess, Pap," she said over her shoulder to her father sitting indoors nursing a sprained ankle and growling his discomfort at intervals. This was the year the Uintah Reservation was thrown open to homesteaders, and for several weeks now there had been similar wagons hastening westward to register at Grand Junction before a specified date. Jess watched the wagon as it came protestingly down the hill. Her practiced eye took in the details at a glance—the dusty canvas top, the weary horses, the chicken-coop fastened at the back, the jaded attitude of the man on the seat. As she watched, the man turned and lifted two little red-clad figures from the depths of the wagon, and placed them beside him.

"Children, too, Pap," she called softly, and her eyes brightened. But when the wagon was quite near, and the man raised his head and looked at her, Jess's heart skipped several beats, and an angry crimson flooded her face. Six years before, when Jess was a slip of a girl of seventeen, she and young Bob Bennett had loved each other at first sight, and with all the impetuosity of their spirited youth. She had met him at Denver on the one occasion when she had been so far east. But a foolish quarrel over a foolish trifle had ended it all, and Bob, proud and piqued, had married another girl; while Jess, proud and hurt, declared she had never loved him, and tried to live the part her lie demanded. She had not seen or heard of him since the day he was married. Now, suddenly, she was face to face with him again. It was too late to draw back into the house, so she stood there in the doorway, a splendid vision of fine young maturity.

The man in the wagon paled a little, but he had come with a purpose, and he would carry it through, cost what it might. He drew up near the door, climbed down from the wagon, and approached Jess. Old Kincaid had limped forward, and stood looking over his daughter's shoulder.

"That's you, is it, Bob Bennett?" he drawled. "You haven't been around this way lately. Guess you won't find us changed any." But the young fellow paid scant attention to the old man. He was scanning Jess's face with an anxious glance. Then he plunged at once into his errand.

"Jess, I came to ask a favor of you."

The angry flush had died out of the girl's face. She glanced coolly into the beseeching eyes, but she made no answer.

"Jess, those are my kids." He pointed to the two little figures perched up on the wagon seat. Such tiny figures, clad in little red calico gowns, bare-footed, tousle-headed, bright-eyed, and each with a thumb tucked into a rosy mouth. Jess's tender heart gave a throb as she looked at the children, but still she said nothing. Her steady gaze came back to Bob's face.

"Their mother is dead," he went on, "and I can't take care of 'em as it ought to be done. I've got to go down to Gunnison; there's a job for me down there. Jess, will you let me leave the kids with you for a while, till I get settled?"

Jess fairly opened her mouth with astonishment. "Leave them with me!" she exclaimed.

"There's not another woman in the world I have any sort of a claim on," he continued, blundering in true masculine fashion as he became more earnest, "and so I thought you'd help me out."

"What claim have you on me?" demanded Jess.

While he hesitated for a reply, Old Kincaid made his way painfully to the wagon, and, reaching up, drew the children from the seat and took them, one on each arm, to where the others stood.

"These here are mighty fine cubs, Jess," he said. "Better take keer on 'em and give Bob a chance."

Jess looked at the babies, and softened. The older baby drew her thumb from her mouth and smiled. The little one turned down a piteous lip, and one tear, sole remnant of a previous sorrow, lost its precarious balance upon his eyelashes and rolled headlong down his velvet cheek. Such wheedling eyes, too, they had. Bob's eyes. A sudden memory smote Jess, and she hardened again.

"'That was long ago, Bob. I know now that I want them'"

When a man makes one blunder he invariably follows it up with another before he finally extricates himself.

"Jess," said Bob, "you loved me once."

"Never!" said Jess emphatically.

"I loved you, anyway."

The little chap on Old Kincaid's arm began to whimper. Jess frowned anxiously. She knew her limitations, and her arms ached to gather the baby to her bosom and comfort him. Pride stepped in, however, and she turned away.

"Very well, then!" said Bob. "I'll take 'em down to Gunnison and adopt 'em out. Guess I'll find somebody glad enough to get such kids as these. You'll be sorry, Jess, to turn down a fellow that loved you once and that comes to you in his trouble."

Wrathfully the youthful father took his children, who were weeping in earnest now, climbed into the wagon, and turned away down the road. Jess and her father stood watching. The dry dust rolled up in clouds about the wagon-wheels and pitiful wails broke out from under the canvas top.

"Seems to me you might have taken the little ones, Jess," said the old man. "Weren't you kind o' hard on Bob, honey?"

Jess turned fiercely. "Hasn't he been kind o' hard on me?" she demanded; and went indoors to hide a storm of tears.

At noon young Kincaid came in with the mail from Hot Sulphur, and Jess prepared dinner. The old man seemed restless, and about mid-afternoon mounted a horse and rode off, in spite of his aching ankle. Jess didn't ask where he was going. She knew; but she said nothing; and later on she too slipped out and, mounted on Starlight, her own horse, rode aimlessly about over the mesas till sundown.

Old Kincaid came in to supper late. After the meal was over he said to Jess, "They've made camp down by Stafford's Ranch, honey." He paused a moment, and then added, "The little fellow is kind o' sick. I guess Bob ain't much of a nurse."

That night Jess sobbed her heart out up in her little attic bedroom. But pride dies hard in a woman. Two days went by on leaden feet. Old Kincaid watched but said nothing. Young Kincaid, noting the general dulness and missing his sister's songs, asked, "What's the matter with Jess?"

"Let her alone, Bub," said his father. "Women folks like a clear field and no pesterin' when they're gettin' their feelin's toned down and their minds made up."

On the third day young Kincaid brought a piece of news.

"That young Bob Bennett, Jess, they say he's been trying to swap off or sell off his two youngsters at Walcott. Always was a queer cuss, anyways."

On the morrow Jess was gone from the house and Starlight from the stable long before sunrise.

At Stafford's Ranch she picked up what news there was; she slept that night, which was Friday, at Blossville; and made what speed she could over the Sheephorn and down into Walcott. Here she found that Bob had not left his children behind, but, with them, was bound for Glenwood Springs. This made her very anxious. Would not some of the summer visitors there be only too glad to adopt the little ones, so rosy, so bright-eyed? She must hasten. Saturday night she slept at the little post office at Dotsero, and Sunday morning was in Glenwood Springs. Still the children had not been left behind, as she determined by much anxious inquiry. No, he had left with them, though he had made attempts to place them, and the three were now headed for Gunnison—so she found out from the grocer at whose place Bob had "stocked up." This was a great relief. He would hardly part with the children this side of Gunnison.

Sunday night she spent at Carbondale. She was very tired, and the next day made her way slowly up the canyon of Crystal River. At her left rose Mount Sopris, looking slivery gray and ghostlike through a fine drizzle of rain. Early in the afternoon she reached a little deserted mining town, mute witness of former activity. The windows and doors of the two rows of wooden cabins were barred up, and all was silent as the grave. One open door, however, excited her curiosity. She looked in. In the rusty stove a fire had been recently made; a crust or two of bread lay upon a bench; a tiny red flannel petticoat lay forgotten upon the floor. Jess burst into tears and seized upon the little garment. Worn out with fatigue and anxiety, she could go no farther. Unstrapping the blanket from Starlight's back, she rolled herself up, lay down upon the floor, and with the horse tethered near, slept till morning.

Tuesday dawned with overcast sky, but no rain, and she continued up along the Crystal River, now a muddy, swollen stream. Beyond Redstone, in a lonely nook within a group of aspens, she found traces of them again, in the ashes of a campfire hardly cold, and she felt that she was hot upon their trail. Nearly all that afternoon she had the world to herself—the endless hills, the great pines, the roaring, tumbling stream that fell through limitless depths from the remote reaches of the Elk Range. Here and there a desolate mail-box, nailed to post or tree, carried her thoughts back to her father; once or twice a lonely grave under the solemn pines, with its encircling fence, hastened her on her way with anxious thoughts of the children. Bob's children! And she used to love Bob. Used to? Well—but there's no time to think of that!

The darkest, dankest, most forbidding of canyons engulfed her in mid-afternoon. Starlight's footsteps echoed dismally between the high, sheer granite walls, and Jess's stout heart quailed a little. Presently, when they came to a snowslide across the road, even Starlight grew nervous, and for a long time refused to cross over it. After that he shied at every unexpected object—at a stake claim set up here and there along the trail, and at a big brass plate of the Geological Survey affixed to a big boulder. Then a sudden swift rain poured down; but when at six o'clock she rode out of the canyon and into the town of Crystal the sun shone out and a splendid rainbow was woven upon the gray clouds eastward; and she found that Bob and the children had left there only that noon.

One has a feeling in Colorado that, no matter how high one climbs, there is always something a little higher over which one can still go. But at eight o'clock on Wednesday morning—she had ridden since three—Jess pulled slowly up the last and worst hill, paused upon the summit, and looked southward into the Gunnison Valley over countless miles. Upon the downsloping hills, like a solar spectrum, lay the richest profusion of flowers, the stately columbine, the blue flax, small saffron sunflowers, great masses of white wild parsnip, tall spikes of larkspur, the vivid flash of scarlet trumpet, the misty purple of the beeflower; and over all the rich, warm sunshine.

"Oh," sighed Jess, "this must be paradise!"

And just then, glancing down at a little blue lake, a liquid jewel upon the bosom of the hills, she saw upon its edge, a mere speck of white—Bob's wagon!

"I was right!" she said, and laughed joyously. "It is paradise, and there are the cherubim?"

Bob was getting breakfast. There were potatoes and bacon frying in the pan, and the two little figures in red calico sat solemnly side by side, their toes arranged in dimpled phalanx before the fire. Their big eyes were fixed unblinkingly upon the preparations, their little bodies swayed forward in expectation. Bob lifted the frying-pan from the fire and put the coffee-pot in its place.

"Now, ladies and gentlemen, breakfast is ready," he said, smiling down into the earnest little faces raised to his. But for all his smile, his heart smote him at the pathos of the utter dependence of these two tiny creatures, and their utter trust.

A clatter of hoofs, a horse drawn up sharply at the roadside, a dismounting figure. Bob looked up. His mouth opened, and the potatoes slid from the pan. Jess looked bedraggled. Her skirt was torn, her hat was lost, her hair hung in disorder about her face, and her bones ached.

"I have come for the children," she said.

Bob stood speechless. It took time for him to understand what had happened. There lay long, hard miles between now and the last time these two had stood face to face; to say nothing of a misunderstanding, which is harder to bridge than mere time or distance. Jess, observing his lack of comprehension, waved an arm toward the babies, who were engrossed in transferring slices of potato from the sand to their mouths.

"Those are my children. You refused them," said Bob.

Jess's mind traveled again the long miles she had ridden. "That was long ago, Bob. I know now that I want them."

Bob, too, thought of those miles. His eyes softened but his lips were firm. He turned away. Even men are obstinate at times.

"Bob," urged Jess pleadingly, "let me have them!" The tiniest baby had lost his balance. Bob righted him gently, and wiped the sand from the little mouth with hands that trembled. Presently he stood up and faced her.

"You threw me over once, and you refused to take them when you had the chance. How can I tell what you really mean?"

Jess turned white and clasped her hands. There was a silence. The coffee-pot bubbled on the fire and sent an odorous incense heavenward. The fate of the babies hung in the balance while Bob and Jess stood there in the sunshine looking steadily at each other. Finally Jess's glance wavered, though she clung firmly to her purpose.

"Bob, will you marry me?"

Bob took a step forward, stumbling over the babies in his astonishment. "Jess!" he exclaimed. "Jess!"

"Wait, Bob, till you hear me. I want the babies. I must have them! If we marry they will be mine, too. We can go down to Crested Butte and be married, and you can take Starlight and go on down to Gunnison. I'll take the wagon and the children and go back home."

"And then?" He took her hands gently in his own. The biggest baby rose on unsteady legs and clasped her father's knee; the little one crawled after her on all fours.

"And then, Bob, when your business is settled, you can come to your babies."

"Jess," said Bob solemnly — you would have thought from his tone that he was offering a prayer—"you're the best friend a fellow ever had. I swear you are!"

Six o'clock that evening found Jess and the wagon and the children back at the edge of the little blue lake. There had been a wedding at Crested Butte at which the bridesmaid and the best man, clad in red calico, had indecorously babbled and laughed throughout the simple ceremony, and had rapturously kissed the bride when all was over. And then Bob had kissed them all three, and, mounted on Starlight, had ridden away over the hills to Gunnison with a light heart.

Seven o'clock, and daylight fading. Jess fed her babies, hobbled the horses, carefully put out the last red ashes of the fire, and spread the blankets upon the mattress in the wagon. Afraid? Not in the land of protecting hills and warm campfires and open hearts. Lonely? Not under those high clear stars and in that vast silence. Jess is not a timid girl. She has come into her womanhood. She draws the little sleepy heads down upon her soft bosom, and sings tender lullabies with an overflowing heart.

Delighted with the Premiums

The Christian Herald Almanac and Samantha at Coney Island have been received and we wish to express our thanks for both. Upon receiving Samantha, I sat down and finished the book that day; since then I have re-read it and find it just as interesting as before. I look for the coming of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD almost as anxiously as I do letters from home. Such clean, wholesome reading acts as a tonic upon the reader, especially so after having glanced through some of the daily papers.

(The Flavor de Luxe)

Mapleine being a prepared product, the question often arises "What is it? What are its ingredients? We answer these very natural questions by stating that Mapleine is a purely vegetable product made from a combination of edible herbs by exactly the same extracting methods as are used to make other natural and vegetable fruit flavorings, such as vanilla and lemon.

There is nothing injurious or defective in Mapleine, hence it conforms to the Pure Food Laws. Neither is it maple or a product of maple, but an original flavoring similar to maple, and better than maple for cooking, for it does not freeze out, cook out, nor granulate.

NOTE.—The answer to Question 8 in List No. 1 should have been "Baruch." Several of our readers have called our attention to this matter, which, however, does not affect the accuracy of the lists published of those who sent correct answers. Answers referring to the correct passages were marked correct; in re-writing the answers for publication the wrong name was inadvertently inserted.

In forwarding their answers to the Bible questions, many of our readers express their warm appreciation of the studies. It is proposed to grade the answers, so that at the season's end all who reach a certain percentage of correct answers will be distinguished in a special manner. Meanwhile, the "Honor Roll" is growing and the interest in this Home Chautauqua increases with every new list of questions printed.

HARD TO DROP

But Many Drop It.

A young Calif. wife talks about coffee: "It was hard to drop Mocha and Java and give Postum a trial, but my nerves were so shattered that I was a nervous wreck and of course that means all kinds of ills.

"At first I thought bicycle riding caused it and I gave it up, but my condition remained unchanged. I did not want to acknowledge coffee caused the trouble for I was very fond of it.

"About that time a friend came to live with us, and I noticed that after he had been with us a week he would not drink his coffee any more. I asked him the reason. He replied, 'I have not had a headache since I left off drinking coffee, some months ago, till last week, when I began again, here at your table. I don't see how anyone can like coffee, anyway, after drinking Postum'!

"I said nothing, but at once ordered a package of Postum. That was five months ago, and we have drank no coffee since, except on two occasions when we had company, and the result each time was that my husband could not sleep, but lay awake and tossed and talked half the night. We were convinced that coffee caused his suffering, so he returned to Postum, convinced that the coffee was an enemy, instead of a friend, and he is troubled no more by insomnia.

"I, myself, have gained 8 pounds in weight, and my nerves have ceased to quiver. It seems so easy now to quit the old coffee that caused our aches and ails and take up Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

JUST BOYS—God Bless 'em

DID you ever see a window-ful of nicer boys than this one? And do you know that it is a typical group of American boys which might be gathered up and photographed in almost any part of the country? Look closely at them. I will wager there is one among them that looks like you. The all-round, average American boy, with his sound body and good heart, his high sense of honor and of fun, is the boy of the world to-day and the eyes of the world are upon him. For general alertness, intelligence and capability, the American boy is far above the average. Is it any wonder he is the hope and the pride of the greatest nation for opportunity and character building on the earth? Nowhere is a boy's life so brilliant or his opportunity so great as in our own country to-day; and the old question, "Success or failure?" is pretty well up to the American boy himself to answer.

Get Ready

THERE is no end of a glorious work to be done. Cities must be built, schools improved and homes set up; new laws must be made and old ones revised. Every branch of science, industry and art is calling for you. There is peace to be maintained and all of the standards of living to be raised to a higher level, and you are the boys to do these things. Remember, it is largely to those whose boyhood stands sound and clean and square to the world that opportunity shall be coming first. So get ready. Plan to be as fine men as you are fine boys. Abraham Lincoln planned all of his boyhood to be a great man. He was ready when the time came to be one. You plucky, brainy, teachable boys, your country needs you every one. Nobody knows who are the great men of to-morrow; that they are the boys of to-day is certain, so get ready is a good motto for "just boys—God bless 'em"—to live by.

A HAPPINESS BOOK

HAVE you ever heard of a happiness book? Well, listen and you shall hear of one.

"What do you do to keep so youthful and beautiful?" said I one day to a very lovely elderly lady with extremely attractive old-lady ways and a beautiful face and voice.

"My dear," said she, "there is little enough philosophy in growing old and unlovely at the same time. I keep reminding myself that it is my privilege to be as beautiful as ever I can manage to be. God means us to be beautiful, and there is nothing so beautifying as happiness, my dear. "See here," she continued, slipping a stately red leather book out of the drawer of a lowdaddy which served her as sewing and writing table, "I keep a Happiness Book. There are never any days of my life so sad but some real pleasure is tucked away in them; and I always make a note of my pleasures and think of them over and over. Glance at some of the entries, dear," she said, handing the big diary to me in her sweet gracious way. "Finished the mittens for Jamie this morning. Such a nice letter from Amy. A daffodil bloomed in the garden. I found Mary's thimble that she thought was lost. Such a pretty girl with dancing eyes and rosy cheeks passed by the window this morning. Alfred's ship was sighted off the Pribilof Islands:" and many pages after these I read this: "Alfred's ship is lost. Alfred was a brave, good man. He loved and served us all so well. His little girl shall always live with me now." There were scraps of verse and quotations, and now and then a pressed flower and a bit of faded silk. That was my first meeting with a Happiness Book. Don't you think it was what Peter Pan, the boy who would not grow up, might have called an adventure? Anyway, I came home that day determined to keep a happiness book, and I have kept one ever since.

Little Folk's Gardens

IF EVERY part of the garden has been spoken for by the older brothers and sisters, then do you choose some little place in the corner of a near-by field or meadow, or down by the stream maybe, and plant some seeds there, caring for them carefully day after day. You will never forget that first little garden, or the first wonderful things that happened there. Sow some pansy seeds and dwarf carnations, white daisies and bachelor buttons. You will be surprised at the loveliness of it. Another cluster which intermingles prettily is clarkias, sweet alyssum, forget-me-not, dusty miller, and baby's breath; this is indeed a fairy garden. The flowers I have mentioned grow so easily, you have only to take a little stick and make holes in the earth not deeper than an inch, then tuck the seeds in and go every day to visit them. You will be so happy when the frail green spears poke their way through the soft brown earth, and when the rain and the sun come to help you make them grow. After that the bees will visit you, and the butterflies, and perhaps a humming-bird or two and do you think when mother's birthday comes that anything would be half so dear to her as a flower that you had planted and cared for yourself?

Be sure to set out a little garden, my dears, and write me about it. I want to help you and I want you to tell me of the things that happen there. By midsummer when your garden shall be its very prettiest you can get some one to take a photograph of it or describe it to me successfully, and if it is very pretty indeed I will send you a beautiful story booklet all about one little girl's flower garden and how it grew. I should like to send many copies of this charming book to CHRISTIAN HERALD boys and girls, so set right to work and get your garden started.

The American Woman

A CORRESPONDENT asks that the American woman be made the subject of consideration on this page. No subject could be more attractive, and few are so difficult in the abstract, because in the concrete the American woman is the most baffling, extraordinary, clever, useful and engaging woman in the world. She can hardly be regarded as a type. When one thinks of an English woman, one sees at a glance, a fair, gentle, capable and dignified home-maker, a woman equal to an emergency, decided of speech, a little reserved, and devoted primarily to the interests of her husband and children. The English woman, too, is thoroughly versed in the politics of her country, is aware of what is going on, knows public men and measures, and is by no means indifferent to the progress of the commonwealth. The suffragette of whom we have heard so much during recent weeks is not universally accepted by her countrywomen as admirable, and many of them deplore her methods even when they are in favor of the object she strives to attain.

Every one knows the Scotch woman, motherly, sensible, shrewd and sweet to the core. The women of France, Germany, Italy, Sweden and Denmark all have characters of their own, and the fascinating Russian woman is a distinct type.

The American woman combines qualities which have come to her by inheritance, and characteristics that have been forced upon her by the peculiarities of her situation. She is devoted to domestic life, but shines in society. At home she is nurse, caretaker and teacher, and with the aid, usually, of very inefficient helpers, cooks dinners, prepares breakfasts, entertains company and does the making and mending essential to the comfort of her boys and girls. In these days she is often a college graduate, and at no time has she been ill-educated, indifferent to books and literature, and unreceptive of the best within her reach. In church work and charity and in the several avenues now open to her in professional life, the American woman nobly advances and accepts her full share of responsibility. To discuss a topic at once so big and so inviting is outside the limits of a column or two. If the readers have anything to say, their contributions will be very much in order and extremely welcome.

No Room for Mother

AN ELDERLY lady was rather surprised one day lately at discovering that in the view of a young visiting friend she was looked upon as rather queer and very hard to please. Thinking over the reasons back of this judgment, it was borne in upon her that one generation does not easily understand the next, and that the distance separating two generations from sympathy and understanding cannot always be bridged over. There comes to women growing old once in a while a mingled feeling of surprise that their juniors cannot peer beneath the mask and see how young the mothers and grandmothers feel, and of regret that the busy juniors have so little leisure to spend with the dear ones who are laid aside from the noonday activity.

So long as a mother can remain in her own home its mistress and queen she is fortunate. The children may live with her, and if they do they will undoubtedly go into the business of running her. They will tenderly interfere with her plans, check her desires to go to meetings, take walks by herself and pay calls upon old friends, and they will be forever on the watch for fear she shall tire herself. All this will be more or less exasperating, but if the house be hers, and she its head, there is a limit to over-zeal in filial attention. Also this mother is sure to be immune from thoughtless neglect.

When John persuades his mother that she would better give up housekeeping and live with him, when Mary coaxingly and lovingly impresses upon mother the notion that she must come and stay with her, that she is needed and wanted, and that life without her lacks flavor, when, in short, mother is induced to depart from her bailiwick and try living elsewhere, she is by no means sure that she may not make a mistake. The daughter's home or that of the daughter-in-law may be shining as the houses in Spotless Town; the daughter's children may be well trained, and the daughter's housekeeping perfect, but mother is almost sure to find herself in a way overlooked, or laid on the shelf. Sometimes she misses the half hours of confidential talk that were formerly hers, and again the good-night kiss is forgotten, and a whole day may pass in which there is no room or share that mother can have in what is going on. This is especially true when the young people occupy the front of the stage. Are you sure, dear reader, if mother is with you, that there is room for her in your heart and your home, as there ought to be?

That Trying Boy

HERBERT is past thirteen. When he was a little fair-haired fellow of five his father and mother were a trifle injudicious, and spoiled him by too much indulgence. When he was eight he was allowed to go to school or stay at home at his discretion. He could always impose upon his mother's affection by the plea that he did not feel well, for, not being very robust, Herbert came in for a good deal of coddling. At thirteen every one is astonished that the boy is not wildly anxious to be at the head of his class, and when his reports are unfavorable, indicating that he is not keeping up with the rest, there are two opinions in the house. His father, who is in the right, insists that Herbert neglects his home work. His mother, in the wrong, throws the entire blame on his overworked teacher. When Herbert goes to school without attending to the little home duties for which he is responsible, somebody else attends to them, and with the stupid remark that "the easiest way is the best," he is not reproved for his delinquency lest he shall pout and be disagreeable.

The boy of thirteen who has been badly started is the victim of parental folly. Those who should have been on the alert to train him from the first have lost their opportunity. Still it is not too late to remedy the situation. At thirteen a boy is still easily impressed and responds to the appeals of genuine love and sympathy. He requires firm handling, but does not respond to injustice, harshness or uncalled-for severity. He can still be molded. Notice with care the companionship about him, and observe whether or not there is an older boy whom he is imitating. He should be drawn into the ranks of one or another fine boyish organization. The Boy Scouts will help him to be manly and chivalrous. If he joins the Knights of King Arthur he will be ashamed of unworthiness and unkindness in home life. Let his father more and more draw him into confidence and treat him like a brother. Let his mother beware of scolding and nagging. Keep him busy and remember that the boy who is interested in athletic sports and keen about outdoor life, and obliged to observe the ordinary rules that govern intercourse in the household, will throw off the faults of the transition period and finally prove himself useful and agreeable in his sturdy youth.

The boy of thirteen should not neglect his attendance at church and Sunday School. Profanity is at the moment in the atmosphere, and so common that it has ceased to be conspicuous. It should be frowned upon in the boy of thirteen as it would be in his sister should she encumber her conversation with profane language.

The Intemperate Husband

NO HAPPY wife, serenely certain that her husband will come home at night entirely himself, even though he may have had a weary and disturbing day, can fully sympathize with her who dreads her husband's return because his brain may be befuddled with drink. That may seem to be a vulgar and unrefined statement. Nevertheless, there are women, some of them readers of this page, who have suffered inexpressible torment and undergone agonizing suspense many a time as they have listened to the step on the porch and for the voice that should greet them when the door was opened. The breath of relief when the periodically intemperate man comes home sane and sensible is a reprieve, but the wife seldom puts behind her altogether the terror that is her companion by day and night. If she is proud, she tries to conceal from the neighbors the overwhelming shame that she feels in her husband's lapses. When the thing can no longer be hidden, her cheek burns and her heart aches at the thought of how her friends pity her.

What can be done to save the inebriate? The obvious reply is, close the saloon. Remove the temptation that flaunts itself at every street corner. Extend no favor to social drinking. Eliminate doubtful flavors from table delicacies. Use stimulants only medicinally by the doctor's advice, and then keep them under lock and key, guarding them as carefully as if they were gunpowder. Begin with the children and teach them that intoxicants are synonyms for poison.

The wife who realizes that her husband is in peril should try by every means in her power to win him to an honest, manly and loyal Christian life. The power of Christ is sufficiently strong to exorcise this demon. A man who is truly converted will have strength given him to overcome the thirst that maddens him, as it clamors in every cell of the brain and paralyzes his will. The intemperate husband will break his chains if he becomes a true Christian. God help the man who has an intemperate wife. For her, too, conversion to Jesus Christ is the only safeguard.

Precocious Children

IF WE should take the tally of the children and grandchildren in our towns and villages, we should no doubt find that stupid children were exceptional, clever children the rule, and precocious children by no means rare. Most parents think their offspring remarkable, and very few children escape the danger of having their sayings and doings dwelt upon with pride in their presence. Here and there, a child forges to the front in study with extreme rapidity. At seven or eight the precocious child is striding ahead in mathematics, writing stories, performing wonders in the recitation room and distancing other children several years older, and very much larger. The youthful prodigy is often the marvel of the town. Occasionally his or her performances are exploited beyond the home town, becoming the theme of comment and focusing criticism in the newspapers.

UNDOUBTEDLY, any bright child may be subjected to a forcing process in a single direction with results that are spectacular. The question is whether the game is worth the candle. To prepare a lad for college and have him triumphantly pass his preliminary and final examinations by the time he is fourteen years old may be done successfully even in this day of advanced university standards. The boy may be permitted to enter while he is wearing short trousers, may surpass young men some years ahead of him, and be graduated with distinction when other boys are entering the freshman class. The little girl of nine or ten or the young girl of sixteen or seventeen may wear laurels on her golden head and reap the early sheaves of fame before she wears her first trained dress. Where will be the ultimate gain? Life, indeed, is longer than it once was, and there are those who keep the fire undimmed until its utmost verge. The fire that is kindled too soon will burn itself out before the meridian. Brain development reaching its climax in the earlier years of life means mediocrity in middle age and premature senility.

THE fact is that we are in far too great a hurry in the training of our children in this period and in this country. We are not willing to let them grow as nature means they shall, along lines that are safe and in ways that have been sanctioned by experience. When the boy is yet in the nursery, his father and mother, looking ahead, behold him in the front rank of business or professional life. The young doctor must be through his hospital practice before he is twenty-five, and this means that he will have left the preparatory school at fifteen and taken honors in the grammar school at eleven. The same thing may be said of other vocations. We want our children to develop with the rushing speed of Jonah's gourd, forgetting that the gourd withered as quickly as it grew. To discourage precocity in children, to give them plenty of time for play, and let them spend hours of daylight and sunlight out of doors, is the part of wisdom. The first seven years of life are best spent outside of schoolroom walls.

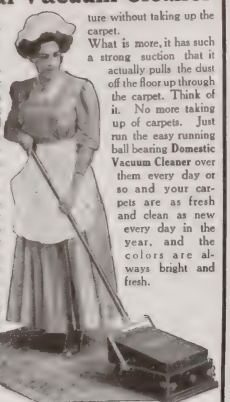
A Real Vacuum Cleaner

Booklet FREE



Here is a Vacuum Cleaner that looks like a carpet sweeper and runs like a carpet sweeper, yet is a powerful vacuum cleaner. As it rolls across the room it sucks up a strong blast of air through the carpet, bringing every particle of dust out of the texture without taking up the carpet. What is more, it has such a strong suction that it actually pulls the dust off the floor up through the carpet. Think of it. No more taking up of carpets. Just run the easy running ball bearing Domestic Vacuum Cleaner over them every day or so and your carpets are as fresh and clean as new every day in the year, and the colors are always bright and fresh.

The pile of dirt shown here was removed by a Domestic Vacuum Cleaner after the rug had been thoroughly cleaned by old methods. Look dirt was down in the texture of the rug beyond the reach of the broom. Try one on your carpets at our risk. If it does not do all we claim, return it at our expense and get your money back. Sent anywhere in the United States East of Rocky Mountains, charges prepaid, upon receipt of $16.00.

CAUTION

Don't confuse the Domestic Vacuum Cleaner with imitations. The Domestic is the only one with the patented adjustable ball bearing roller nozzle. It rolls over the carpet and does not drag and wear out the carpet as imitations do.

Quarterly Review Lesson*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

First Lesson: Birth of John the Baptist Foretold

Golden Text: Without faith it is impossible, etc.

THE aged priest Zacharias was in the temple. The message was brought by the angel that he should have a son, in spirit and power like the prophet Elijah. The promise was too great for Zacharias to believe, and he asked for a sign from God that it would be true.

Truth: God has a purpose in each life he gives.

Illustration: When Mozart was only six years old he first saw a large organ in the monastery of a little town on the Danube. "Father," said the boy, "explain to me those pedals at the organ's feet, and let me play." Well pleased, the father complied. Then the boy pushed aside the stool, and when his father had filled the great bellows, the elfin organist stood upon the pedals and trod them as though he had never needed to have their management explained. The organ roared for very joy at the caresses of the marvelous child. The monks, eating their supper in the refectory, heard, and dropped knife and fork in astonishment. The organist of the brotherhood was among them; but he never had played with such power and freedom. They listened; some grew pale, others crossed themselves, till the prior rose up, summoned all his courage, and hastened to the chapel. They looked up into the organ loft and saw no player sitting on the organ seat; then they mounted the stairs and stood petrified with amazement. There stood the tiny figure, treading from pedal to pedal, at the same time clutching the keys above with his little hands, gathering handfuls of those wonderful chords as if they were violets, and flinging them out into the solemn gloom behind him.

Second Lesson: Birth of John the Baptist

Golden Text: Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, etc.

As God had promised, in due time a son was born unto Zacharias and Elisabeth, and his name was called John as the angel had said it should be. When the babe was eight days old, his name feast was held, and the great dignitaries of the church as well as friends came to participate in it.

Truth: Have faith in God and in his promises.

Third Lesson: The Birth of Jesus

Golden Text: For there is born unto you this day, etc.

The angel had promised Mary that she should have a little child who should be the Son of the Most High God. And when he was born, angels announced his birth, first bringing a message to the shepherds watching their flocks, and then singing in the skies a message for the whole world, that the Prince of Peace was born.

Truth: Jesus the All-Saviour.

No Darning for Six Months

Guaranteed

Buy six pairs of genuine Holeproof Hose today for your children and yourself and they will wear without holes, tears, or any necessity of darning until six months from today, or we will give you new hose free. The dealer from whom you buy will give you a signed-in-ink guarantee and coupons to send back should any hose wear out.

Dealers are now showing the new Spring colors.

Genuine Holeproof Hose, the original guaranteed hose, have been sold this way for the past twelve years. Last year 95% of our entire output outlasted that guarantee—were longer than six months.

Yet "Holeproof" are not heavy or coarse, like other guaranteed hose. They are made from Egyptian and Sea Island cotton yarn, costing an average of seventy cents per pound. There is no better cotton yarn to be had. No one can pay any more for it, for that is the top market price. Common yarn sells for thirty cents a pound—less than half what we pay for ours.

We use in the silk goods only pure thread silk from northern Japan.

It is this quality in Holeproof Hose that makes them wear, makes them soft, light in weight, and stylish. Hose made from heavy yarn may wear six months, but nobody wants to wear them. There is only one genuine "Holeproof"—only one guaranteed hosiery made with seventy-cent yarn. It is

The "Holeproof" trade-mark and the signature above are found on the toe of each pair of genuine "Holeproof." We have had thirty-eight years of hose-making experience. There are hundreds of imitations of the genuine, but you can avoid them by looking for the signature.

The genuine is sold in your town. We'll tell you the dealer's names on request or ship direct where we have no dealer, charges prepaid on receipt of remittance. Try "Holeproof." You'll never wear another kind of hosiery once you do.

Sunday School Lesson

Illustration: A father looking at his little newborn daughter wrote these beautiful lines:

My darling child! God's little daughter dressed
In human clothes, that light may be thus clad
In shining, so to reach my human eyes!
Come as a little Christ from heaven to earth
To call me "Father," that my heart may know
What Father means, and turn its eyes to God.

GEORGE MACDONALD.

Fourth Lesson: The Presentation in the Temple

Golden Text: For mine eyes have seen thy salvation, etc.

When forty days old Jesus was brought into the temple by his mother Mary and his foster-father Joseph. There they were met by two aged people: Simeon, who had been hoping to see the Messiah before he should die, and Anna, who, though a widow eighty-four years old, through the child instinct in her heart recognized the Wonderful Child, the hope of Israel.

Truth: None are too old to love and serve Jesus.

Illustration: A mother thus tells of her little child: "'Am I a little thing?' said my baby girl of four to me a few nights ago. 'Yes,' I answered with the full assurance of grown-up mothers. 'But,' she persisted with the wise argumentativeness of babyhood, 'I love you big.'

"The baby wisdom set me thinking as I rocked my child in my arms, until the little hand loosened its hold of mine, and she lay asleep in my lap, so soft and round and pure; so still after all the ceaseless prattle of the day, so warm and alive, so blessedly my 'little child'—little, but 'big to love.'"

How big to love was the little Lord Jesus? Not only for the mother Mary, but for the whole world. And glad we are when Christmas comes each year to bring us again the Holy Child.

Fifth Lesson: The Wise Men Led by the Star

Golden Text: Look unto me, etc.

In a far distant land, men who studied the sky like a map had been looking for a new star, for that was to be a sign by which they should know that the King of the Jews had been born. When at last they saw the star appear, they took a long journey to find him, taking with them gifts of gold and frankincense and myrrh. Wonder of wonders! on the latter part of their journey the star went before them, showing the way, until it came and stood over where the young child was! And when they had bowed before him, and offered their gifts, they returned to their far-away home.

Truth: Finding Jesus and honoring him as King.

Sixth Lesson: The Boy Jesus in the Temple

Golden Text: How is it that ye sought me? etc.

When Jesus was twelve years old, he was taken up to the temple by Mary and Joseph that he might become a "son of the law." He was so interested in the teachings of the doctors of the law that he lingered in the temple after Mary and Joseph had started to return to Nazareth. They missed him after a day's journey, and returned to Jerusalem to find him. They found him among the doctors, both hearing them and asking them questions. But he was obedient and returned to Nazareth. All that we know of Jesus for eighteen years after this episode is that he "advanced in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man."

Truth: Even a boy is known by his doings.

Illustration: There is a lovely picture of a little boy five years old seated in his father's armchair attired in the wig and gown of his father, who was an English lawyer. The white wig rests against his peachlike cheeks, and large, luminous eyes peer out from beneath it; under the chubby chin rests

Hupmobile Long-Stroke "32" Touring Car, $900

F. O. B. Detroit, including equipment of windshield, gas lamps and generator, oil lamps, tools and horn. Three speeds forward and reverse; sliding gears; four cylinder motor 3¾ inch bore by 5½ inch stroke. Bosch magneto, 106 inch wheelbase. 32 x 3½ inch tires. Color, standard Hupmobile blue. Roadster, $900.

'Long-Stroke' Means Long-Stroke in the New Hupmobile

We have figured always that it was the wisest kind of enlightened selfishness to give more than the public expected.

Thus, only one motor in America has a longer stroke than the engine in the new Hupmobile "32."

And this car sells for several times the Hupmobile price of $900.

The relation of stroke to bore in the new Hupmobile is the mean average of the best and latest European practice; and is positive assurance of greater pulling power.

The cylinders are cast en bloc; the crankshaft, of special drop forged high carbon steel, is equipped with three especially liberal bearings, instead of two; the valves—all on one side—are completely encased, oil-tight and dust-proof, yet instantly accessible.

Note these evidences of extra-generous construction, please, and compare them with other cars at the Hupmobile price.

You will see in the engine and transmission unit a triumph of mechanical adaptation, which makes for increased efficiency and space economy.

The full-floating rear axle, in itself, places the Long-Stroke "32" in an exclusive class.

You can ascribe all these constructive advantages to the fact that the Hupmobile organization has always been held practically intact.

The chief engineer, E. A. Nelson, designed the original Hupmobile runabout—whose priority in its own class has never been seriously disputed. The department heads, and the skilful workmen who have executed his designs, have remained with us in our progressive development.

We should be glad to send to you 4½ x 8½ photogravures and full description of the handsome Long-Stroke "32."

Sunday School Lesson

the white necktie, small hands lie upon the arms of the chair, almost enveloped in the sleeves of the gown; bare knees, and tiny slippered feet, not reaching to the floor, are upheld by the heavy folds of the gown that rest on the floor. The story is that the boy so arrayed himself that he might "surprise" his father. The father looked and laughed, and knew that the day was not far distant when the boy would be wearing his own lawyer clothes.

The childhood shows the man,
As morning shows the day.

Seventh Lesson: The Ministry of John the Baptist

Golden Text: Repent ye, etc.

John, having grown to manhood, began his ministry of being the forerunner of Christ. He preached in Judea and baptized in the River Jordan, and almost the whole city (Jerusalem) went out to hear him. The way was rugged and long (not less than fifteen miles). That fact gives us some idea of the drawing power of the preacher. He did not preach soft things, but some of his hearers he called "vipers," as he looked upon their hard faces, which were the index of their wicked hearts. John told the multitudes of Jesus who should soon appear, and who should be a greater and a mightier preacher than he. He was a faithful witness.

Truth: Winning souls for Jesus.

Illustration: It is told that a Christian coolie in Korea rose early every morning to pray. In the same village there lived an elderly gentleman, well educated. He, too, rose early to feed his cow. The illiterate coolie prayed for the scholar and longed to tell him of the love of Christ. But how could he presume to engage in conversation with one so learned? At length he thought of a plan. Having sought an interview he said: "Sir, may I exchange labor with you?" "What kind of work could we exchange?" was the reply. The coolie answered, "It must be hard for you to get up early in the morning to feed your cow. I am ignorant, and cannot read, while you are a great scholar. I will come every morning and do that work for you, if you will read a chapter in the Bible every day to me." The gentleman agreed to this. At the end of a month, he was so interested that he commenced reading the Bible for himself, and not long afterward he declared his faith in Christ, and became a church member. Great was the coolie's joy in thus winning a soul for his Master, the Lord Jesus.

Eighth Lesson: The Baptism and Temptation

Golden Text: For in that he himself hath suffered, etc.

Jesus came one day to John to be baptized of him. But John said, "I have need to be baptized of thee." When Jesus urged him, John baptized him. After his baptism, Jesus went alone into the wilderness, and there he fasted forty days. Satan followed him there, and tempted him, but Jesus was without sin, and he drove Satan away by using the sword of the Bible.

Truth: The power of temptation and how to overcome it.

Ninth Lesson: The Call of the First Disciples

Golden Text: The harvest indeed is plenteous, etc.

Jesus was walking along the shore of the Sea of Galilee, teaching the people he met either singly or in groups, when he saw Simon and Andrew casting their nets, and quite near them he saw James and John, sitting in their boat with Zebedee, their father, mending their nets. Jesus called them by name and told them to come with him, and he would make them fishers of men. So they left all, and went with him. They had already been much with him, where he lodged, and as he went about among men.

Truth: Called to work with God.

Illustration: The apostle Paul wrote two letters to his "son in the faith," young Timothy. In the second letter he urged him to be "a vessel unto honor, sanctified, and meet for the Master's use, and prepared unto every good work." To Titus, another son in the faith, he also wrote a letter, in which he counseled him "to be ready to every good work." These letters are in the Bible we own, and they are for us to read and do likewise.

Tenth Lesson: Jesus the Healer

Golden Text: Himself took our infirmities, etc.

Jesus was spending the Sabbath day in Capernaum. He had attended the synagogue in the morning and healed a demoniac, then he came to Peter's home, and healed Peter's wife's mother, who was sick of a fever. In the evening the sick in all the city were brought to the door of Peter's house, and Jesus healed them all. The next day he went out on a preaching tour, and healed a leper. No one but Jesus would touch a leper, but Jesus touched him, and said, "Be thou clean," and at once the leprosy left him.

Truth: Jesus a sympathizing Saviour.

Illustration:

Closest to men, thou pitying Son of man,
And thrilled from crown to foot with fellowship;
Yet most apart and strange, lonely as God,
Dwell in my heart, remote and intimate One!
Brother of all the world, I come to thee.

FREDERICK LAWRENCE KNOWLES.

Eleventh Lesson: The Paralytic Forgiven and Healed

Golden Text: Bless Jehovah, O my soul, and forget not, etc.

Four friends carried their sick friend on his bed to the home where Jesus was teaching the people. They could not get him in through the door, because of the crowd, so they let him down through the roof, just in front of Jesus. "Son, thy sins are forgiven. Arise, take up thy bed, and go into thy house." These were the gracious words Jesus spoke to the sick man, and his soul was cleansed of sin, and his body was cured of disease.

Truth: Jesus is a living friend and helper.

Illustration: A little ragged bootblack fell on the icy streets of a city one day. A cheery young lady passing said, as she helped him up, "Did you hurt yourself?" His whole face beamed as, after her departure, he said to his companions: "I'd like to fall a dozen times if I could have her pick me up like that." So may each of us reflect the cheerful, helpful spirit of the Master.

Twelfth Lesson: Feasting and Fasting

Golden Text: I came not to call the righteous, but, etc.

When Jesus first saw Matthew, he was an odious tax-gatherer. As he was about his duties by the sea, he heard Jesus preaching to the multitude and his heart was changed. Later, when Jesus saw Matthew, he knew that he was ready for the summons, "Follow me." And Matthew left his money-getting and followed Jesus as one of his apostles. Then Matthew made a feast at his own house and invited his publican friends so that they might hear the words of Jesus and become his friends, and they did!

Truth: Learning to follow Jesus.

Illustration: A Christian soldier was once asked how he was converted, and he answered, "God seemed to say to me, 'Halt! Right about face! March!' I did just what he told me, and turned around, and ever since I have been marching on to glory."

Foreign Missions*

IN a recent issue of the Missionary Link, Miss Crosby writes of the pupils of her Yokohama school. Many of them do not remain in that city, but remove to another, or to some remote country district; but nearly all of them become Christians in the school, and remain faithful wherever they go. One of them, Mrs. Watanabé, married and went to the wild northern island of Yezo, to develop a government grant of rough farm land. The husband has proved to be a drunkard, but his bright, efficient little wife has applied herself to the work so successfully that, with such help as he could give her, the farm has been made very productive. She has a large family of children whom she is bringing up in the fear of the Lord. She has been among the most active in organizing a church and a Sunday School in her neighborhood, and has done wonderful work in adding members to the church. Does it not almost seem as though that Yokohama school would have to produce no more than this one case to prove its usefulness?

But it has many more fruits to show. One of its graduates has just married a young preacher in Tokyo, the pastor of a large church. Think of the opportunities thus opened before her. Another, who began her service by distributing tracts among the "rickshaw men," is now, though married and unable to continue her labors in that line, working constantly to relieve the poor and the sick, and always in Christ's name.

In many cases there is real conversion, but the contumely is likely to be so great that Christ is not openly acknowledged. Says Miss Costellow, of Calcutta, "At the station, while waiting for the train, there was an opportunity to talk with a Bengali gentleman and his family. He had been educated in a Christian college and said he was at heart a Christian, but had not the courage to confess it among his Calcutta friends." He and his intelligent wife asked the missionary to call upon them and tell them about "the Jesus Christ book."

Read of the wonderful work which the mission hospitals are doing. They have probably helped more than any other one element, to establish our missionaries in the love and confidence of the people. Mrs. Mary Bliss Dale writes from Beirut to Woman's Work, interesting accounts of the great success of the two Protestant hospitals there, of which she is the superintendent. One wild Persian highwayman, who boasted that he had killed twenty men, was converted through the ministrations of the hospital and became a gentle and devout Christian. One mother brought her poor baby boy, with crumpled-up little club-feet, but she begged that only one of them might be straightened, for if he had two good feet he would have to do military service as a man! The tales which these missionaries tell are absorbingly interesting.

*Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, March 31. TEXT: Matt. 28: 16-20.

To My Mother

SONNETS are full of love, and this my tome
Has many sonnets; so here now shall be
One sonnet more, a love sonnet, from me
To her whose heart is my heart's quiet home,
To my first love, my mother, on whose knee
I learned love-lore that is not troublesome;
Whose service is my special dignity,
And she my lodestar while I go and come.

And so because you love me, and because
I love you, mother, I have woven a wreath
Of rimes wherewith to crown your honored name:
In you not fourscore years can dim the flame
Of love, whose blessed glow transceends the laws
Of time and change and mortal life and death.
Selected. CHRISTINA ROSSETTI.

THE HIGH COST OF FOOD

State Legislatures, County Prosecutors and Grand Juries Trying to Fix Blame for High Prices

Housekeepers find it more difficult than ever to keep the table decently supplied with food and at the same time keep the grocery and meat bills from going beyond the weekly income.

The excessive cost of eggs, butter and potatoes is particularly burdensome, the prices having gone to such a figure that the public has reason to suspect collusion between provision dealers and the cold storage plants.

To find out the relation of middlemen to cold storage concerns and also the relation of the farmer to butter and egg dealers, is the object of an investigation started by the district attorney of New York and by prosecuting attorneys in other States.

In such times many persons who never stopped to consider the food value of the cheaper foodstuffs are making a study of the subject. They have found that neither meat, nor eggs, nor potatoes, are necessary for man's complete nourishment. They are gradually learning that man can get from cereals and fruits all the strength needed for any kind of labor with hands or brain.

Two shredded wheat biscuits—which may be bought at any first class grocery store—eaten with milk and a little fruit, make a complete, nourishing meal that is easily digested and will supply a greater amount of real, strength-giving nutriment than meat or eggs. While not as fattening as potatoes, it supplies a greater amount of muscle-building material and enough carbohydrates to keep the body warm in cold weather. The total cost of such a meal should not be over four or five cents.

A breakfast of shredded wheat biscuit and fruit is about the easiest and simplest of all meals to prepare. Shredded wheat biscuit is ready-cooked and ready-to-serve. It is the only cereal breakfast food made in biscuit form and hence combines most naturally with stewed prunes, baked apples, sliced bananas, canned peaches or other canned fruits. Persons who live on a diet of this kind are seldom troubled with any derangements of the digestive system and are nearly always capable of doing a larger amount of work with less effort than those who live largely upon meat and eggs. The housewife who knows shredded wheat biscuit and the many nourishing combinations that can be made with it will find her housekeeping problems greatly simplified and will also find it very easy to keep down the grocery bills without lowering the standards of living.

Epworth Foreign Work*

IT IS probably from among you of the League that the missionaries of the future or their support must come. The older generations are passing rapidly away. Upon your shoulders will soon fall this great responsibility. In order to awaken and maintain the enthusiasm which is necessary to discharge well that responsibility, you must read, talk and think much of mission-work.

It is often through the skill and understanding of the native helpers that the most effective work is done. In connection with the African mission of Magog, a little chapel made of reeds and grass has just been dedicated at Umzumbi outstation. One devoted native has been the mainstay of this outstation. Some years ago, a chapel of "wattle and daub" was put up there, but it became unfit for further use, so this good man tore it down. How was he to build another? He decided to borrow five dollars in order to hire men to help him gather grass. Then he worked alone for many days, cutting the necessary timbers from the bush, thatching the roof and binding the reeds. He plastered the inside with mud. The missionaries helped him to get the doors and windows. The last thing was the cindering of the floor. Women do that sort of work in Umzumbi, so this man's good wife and her friends attended to the matter. By making baskets, he earned enough to repay his debt. Then he felt that the chapel could be dedicated.

The "multitude" who would come would have to be fed; so this faithful man went to work and managed to gather food enough for seventy-five people. The pupils of the girls' school at Magog were going over en masse. Food for them was sent from the school on the day previous to the ceremony.

The little chapel was packed full on the great occasion, and as many more gathered outside, where the thin reed walls permitted them to hear all that went on. The collection, amounting to $8, was considered munificent. After lunch, there was a second service, at which many black Christians testified, among them the devoted builder of the chapel. He said that he meant to keep the light of God shining on that hill, so that it would be "like a sweet voice calling all who saw it to turn to God."

Is not this a beautiful story? Only the outline has been given here. Get the magazine and read all of it.

Our hearts should burn within us, as we read of the thrilling experiences of those who have gone forth to learn new languages, take up new habits and customs, and endure hardships in obedience to Christ's command to "go into all the world and preach the Gospel."

* Epworth League Topic for Sunday, March 31. TEXT: Isa. 43: 6.

The Word "Obey"

THE London Sketch has the following verses, founded on the recent incident where at an English wedding at which the Archbishop of Canterbury officiated, the bride demurred at using the word "obey":

Phyllis, please listen without animosity
If, very humbly, I venture to say
That I'm consumed with a weak curiosity
As to the vows you will utter to-day.
When you, in old-fashioned trappings all glorious,
Stand at the altar in bridal array,
Think of that horrible headline, "Notorious Bride who omitted the words 'and obey.'"

Will you, adopting the Suffragette attitude,
Brand your poor husband as Juggins the J?
If you would win my unqualified gratitude
Fill not my rapturous heart with dismay.
Come, on our wedding morn, let us be sensible,
No one, I promise, shall give you away
If you will speak that absurd, reprehensible,
Early Victorian phrase 'and obey.'"

Questions and Answers

J. L., Cadillac, Mich. 1. Is it not likely that the three wise men from the East were of Jewish descent? 2. What was the star (his star)? Was it a light body like that of the burning bush, directed especially to start and finish the journey of the wise men, or was it some regular visitant?

1. Magism is supposed to have originated in Chaldea and thence spread to the adjacent countries. The Magians are believed to have been originally Semitic. Among the Greeks and Romans they were known as Chaldeans. Daniel sympathized with the order during his exile, and probably became one of their number. They believed in God, hated idolatry and looked for a Messiah. The latter fact alone would almost be regarded as conclusive evidence of their Semitic descent. There are no absolute data, however, for asserting it positively. 2. "His star" can be interpreted as "his sign." Whatever form it assumed, it was sufficiently marked as an astronomical phenomenon to claim attention. Some writers have contended that it was visible to the Magi alone; others hold that it was a heavenly light, standing as a beacon of glory over the manger; still others, that it was the luminous figure of an angel. Tradition asserts that "the star" guided the Magi both by day and by night.

C. R. C., Shelbyville, Tenn. 1. Please explain the words, "The prince of the power of the air," in Eph. 2: 2. 2. We sometimes hear some of our older people, especially among the negro race, speak of the "dark days." To what do they refer?

1. It refers to Satan, the "prince of evil," who assails men on earth with trials and temptations. The word "power" is used here for the embodiment of that evil spirit which is the ruling principle of all unbelief, especially among the heathen. See I. Tim. 4: 1; II. Cor. 4: 4; John 12: 31. 2. They doubtless refer to certain days in modern times of almost supernatural darkness. Such a day was May 19, 1780, when, throughout a large part of this continent, the whole visible heavens and atmosphere became unaccountably dark, bringing intense alarm and distress to multitudes and dismay even to the brute creation. Many became convinced that the end of the world was at hand. Candles had to be lighted at midday. The darkest hours were between 10 o'clock and noon and the general darkness did not disappear during the whole day. In the Eastern States it continued for fourteen or fifteen hours. The primary cause has never been satisfactorily determined, although later investigators believe the darkness to have been due to a huge area of volcanic dust in the upper atmosphere.

R. N. W., Allston, Mass. 1. What were the name and characteristics of the language spoken before the confusion of tongues at Babel? Also, is the site of the Tower of Babel known to-day? 2. Why is it that Tolstoy, Edward Everett Hale and Julia Ward Howe towered head and shoulders over the majority of professed Christians, and these persons denied the deity of our Lord? 3. We are told in our Sunday School Lesson that "John" means "Jehovah had Mercy."

1. Philologists are divided concerning the language spoken before the "Confusion of Tongues" at Babel. What little we know of it is learned at second-hand from the testimonies of classical authorities. The Babylonians called the locality of Babel "Barsip" (the Tower of Tongues). A French expedition to Mesopotamia found a clay cake or tablet, which showed that the language at some indefinitely remote period was written in the form of signs and hieroglyphics; but even this was probably long after the dispersion at Babel. What universal language was spoken by prehistoric man thousands of years ago will probably never be definitely known. It may have been Babylonian or Arabic in character, but this is mere conjecture. Supplementary to the Bible record, there are many traditions preserved concerning the Tower and its fate, and these mostly claim for it a Babylonian origin, holding that Babylonia was the cradle of the human race. The site of the tower, according to modern opinion, is identified as Birs Nimrud, a huge mound covering gigantic ruins and situated at Felujiah in Mesopotamia; but this identification is by no means certain. 2. The same might be said of the learned men in the time of Christ. Intellectuality is not always an aid to spiritual life; on the contrary, there are very many cases in which it has proved a barrier. One does not perceive God through the intellect alone, and this is shown in the fact that many of the most spiritual natures have been found among the simple and unlearned. Intellectual vanity and self-sufficiency—an overweening confidence in the powers of the finite mind—are among the strongest impediments to faith. "Ye must become as a little child." 3. John (or as it is in the Hebrew form "Johanan") means "Jehovah hath been gracious," which is practically in line with the interpretation you give.

L. S., Grand View, S. D. 1. In II. Kings 3: 19-22, why was the land barren? 2. See Ex. 15: 23-25. What relation is there between these and the foregoing passages?

1. It was a common incident of war in ancient days for an invading army to strew the fields with stones to render them incapable of tillage. 2. There is no connection between the passages in II. Kings and Exodus. Marah is believed to be what is now called Howarah in the Amarah Valley, about thirty miles distant from the point where the Israelites landed after the passage of the Red Sea. The water there still retains its ancient character and has a bad name among the Arabs.

Mrs. McC., Green Spring, O. I have often wondered just where the Chinese get their supplies when they get this famine relief money. I suppose they must be bought there at famine prices, for a while at least.

Money is sent by cable, because it is always the speediest way of affording relief. Food can be bought at various places in China, although the prices are doubtless high at present. In previous famines rice has been purchased at Rangoon in Burmah and other comparatively nearby ports. It would be a great blessing if our government would decide to send one or more relief ships, as was done in previous famines. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers supplied cargoes for several such vessels, and a year ago assisted in sending a shipload in the transport Buford. There are hopes that when peace is fully restored, conditions may greatly improve.

A. T. B., East Orange, N. J. What is considered the worst sin?

According to Scripture it is the sin against the Holy Ghost, which is attributing the works of the Spirit to Satanic agency. It has been called the "unpardonable sin."

E. S., Baltimore, Md. We are told in the Bible that whatsoever we ask in faith we shall receive. Now if it is not for our benefit the Lord will not answer, but how are we to know this while we are praying for a desired object?

The various passages referring to prayer must be taken together. While we are told that we shall receive everything for which we have faith (Matt. 21: 22 and other passages), we are also told that we can receive only what is "according to his will." The necessary conclusion is that it is impossible to exercise prevailing faith when the thing we request is not in accord with God's will. The assurance that our prayer is in line with the divine will comes before the faith; if we are not sure of the divine will we cannot exercise positive faith. The true method is to pray most constantly and fervently to have God show us his will; when he has done this it is easy to pray the prayer of faith, which will bring the desired favor.

G. F., Katonah, N. Y. Was Paul a married man or not?

He is supposed to have been unmarried. There are evidences from his own writings that he had remained single to consecrate himself to the Lord's work. See I. Cor. 7: 7-8, which clearly bears out this implication.

M. S. C., Elkview, Pa. I know it is customary for a Christian to give one-tenth of his income to the Lord's work. If a person gives one-half his income for the same work, is his reward in heaven greater than if he gave only one-tenth? Is this what is meant by laying up treasures in heaven?

Kindness and humanity, the voluntary outpourings of a generous heart, are always pleasing in God's sight. Zaccheus was commended by Jesus no less for his liberality in giving half his goods to the poor than for his justice and integrity. His abounding charity covered many shortcomings, and his obedience to law and his firm hold on Abraham's faith as evidenced by works were both appreciated; but it was his faith in Christ as Lord that led to his salvation (see Luke 19: 9, 10). Even with the utmost liberality, we cannot buy heaven; yet no kind act, no generous gift, is unrewarded. We should give as freely as our hearts prompt and our circumstances permit. All wealth is a trust to be used for the highest purposes, and our use of our means and influence here will unquestionably have its effect in determining our reward hereafter.

Congressional Committee Hearing the Testimony of the City Officials of Lawrence, Mass.

EARLY in March a Congressional committee summoned the city officials of Lawrence, Mass., to appear before it and explain the methods used for protecting property and regulating crowds during the violence which accompanied the early part of the Textile Workers' strike. It was claimed by the legal representatives of the strikers that the officials had exceeded their constitutional rights in preventing the sending of children to other cities. Some of the children who were arrested and some who had previously been sent to New York were examined by the committee to ascertain their side of the story. Mrs. Taft was deeply interested in the proceedings and spent one whole day at the Capitol listening to the evidence.

Miscellaneous

Miss L. H. B., Briggs, Va. See answer to H. E. F., Durand, Wis., in MAIL-BAG of January 3, regarding the brethren of Jesus.

A. R. K., Alberton, Ontario. There is no such passage in the Bible, although there are many that urge the reverent and diligent reading and study of God's Word.

B. F. H., Republic, Wash. The passage in Revelation concerning the number 666 is not interpreted by students as having anything to do with the number of religious sects and denominations of the present day. It has been discussed in a recent issue of THE MAIL-BAG.

B. B., Lyons, N. Y. Law permits the sale of such articles, although they are reasonably objected to on grounds of health, and especially with a view to the protection of the young. One who sells them cannot have a very tender conscience.

Reader, Newark, N. J. Astrology, or the revealing of the future by means of the stars, is one of the oldest of pseudo-sciences and all through history has been regarded as a mere pretense of science; yet it still holds sway in the East, although it has few believers in Christian lands except among the ignorant. Astrologers are denounced in the Bible along with diviners, wizards, sorcerers and necromancers. In most civilized countries they are now suppressed by the police. Phrenology, or the reading of character through the conformation of the skull, is also an empirical science. It originated with Franz Joseph Gall, a German physician, and is still used by itinerant lecturers, although it has little claim to be regarded as scientific.

A PROPHET OF THE MOUNTAINS

J. A. Burns, Who Has Banished Feudism Through Education and the Gospel

THIS story had its beginning in a baby's cradle in a West Virginia mountain cabin. The father was a minister from Kentucky, who feared his family of sons might somehow come under the influence of the feud spirit, were he to remain on his well-beloved Kentucky soil; so he moved to West Virginia. It was not until the child had grown to be a young man of twenty that he journeyed with his widowed mother to Kentucky, the home of his father's and her kin.

Like many others, J. A. Burns was soon involved in the feuds of the mountaineers. On one occasion he was knocked on the head with a gun, thrown over a fence and left for dead. He suffered through the long night, and when morning came he dragged himself to the nearest cabin, where he was given such succor as the place afforded. He was grateful for this kindly aid, but as soon as he had sufficiently recovered he set out, filled with the spirit of vengeance against his assailant. He had proceeded but a little way when, like Saul of Tarsus, he was suddenly halted in his impetuous career. God spoke to him on that hillside and showed him the wickedness of his course. He prayed earnestly for forgiveness and resolved with God's help to live thereafter a life of peace, and to influence others to do the same. He realized, for the first time, the great need of the people of the hills.

In a few weeks he was on his way to West Virginia, to work out his plan of wiping out the feud spirit, not by killing off his foes, but by educating the coming generation to a higher conception of life. He was haunted by what he had seen and experienced during his short stay in the Kentucky mountains. He consecrated his life to his new work. He had a natural gift of oratory, and his friends urged him to go to Denison University, where he spent seven months in study. All told, his preparation for the career of an educator was limited to seventeen months' study in public school and college. On leaving the university, he began his campaign by teaching a free school in winter, a pay school in summer and by preaching on Sunday. He soon saw that his energies would quickly be depleted in trying to cover so wide a territory, so he began to plan a school to be established in the center of this area, which would draw pupils from the mountains. How well he planned is seen to-day in the Oneida Institute, which he founded forty miles from a railroad station, in the very heart of the feud country.

Some Typical Students from Mountain Homes

At first he had not even the gift of a dollar or an acre of land. Because of his determination to build a school for the benefit of the mountaineers, forty miles from the railroad, he was regarded as a visionary and was refused assistance from the various denominational organizations, which saw nothing but failure, unless the school were built in a railroad town. He begged a landowning cousin for an acre of ground and was refused. Then he succeeded in convincing a few Oneida citizens and a board of trustees was at last organized. The first meeting was held in an old mill shed which was full of bullet holes from former battles, and the board itself was made up of two warlike factions of an ancient feud. Many at this first meeting were face to face with old enemies, and glared at each other while Burns was making his appeal. But the incorporation was effected and the enterprise was launched, though without a dollar in sight. Its single asset was Burns's inflexible faith and earnest purpose. The only help he could get from the trustees was their promise not to fight while he was building the schoolhouse, which was a big concession; but they would not contribute a foot of lumber nor an hour of work. It is sad to be compelled to record the fact that the promise to keep peace was forgotten. Before the building was finished the feuds had claimed more victims.

To organize a school board and incorporate an institution was one thing, but to build a house without land or money was quite another. Burns was master of the situation because, back of all opposition, he had the one great abiding purpose to open the door of opportunity to the Kentucky mountaineers. He wanted to destroy the feuds, and he meant to do this by awakening the people to a recognition of their higher destiny. How well he did his work is best told by the six hundred students who are now a living monument to his well-directed energies in Oneida Institute.

At the beginning, Burns worked alone.

The Most Popular Book in the World

TEXTS: "The word of the Lord abideth forever." I. Peter 1: 25 (R. V.) "Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away." Jesus Christ

THE Bible is, in every way, without any question, the most popular book in the world. It is published in more editions, bought by more people, translated into more languages, quoted from oftener, and used in more places than any other book that was ever written by any one at any period of the world's history. The combined output of all the publishers of the Bible in one hundred years has been over 500,000,000 copies. The number of translations at the present time is 486. The number of people studying the Bible in regular courses is unknown, but it is safe to say that it is greater than the combined members of all the colleges and schools and educational institutions in the world. It is the only book which is uniformly used by the different denominations as a text-book for sermons. It is the only book in the world which has been recognized for centuries as containing the greatest and best truths for mankind.

But, after all these things have been said, and they are simply facts which all of us know, there still remains the exceedingly interesting question: Why is this true? Why is the Bible the most popular book in the world? Reasons for it can be given, and this is a simple attempt on my part to give, in the simplest possible manner, some of the reasons why this Book of all books is what it is, and is what may be termed, in common language, the most popular book in the world.

The Mightiest Theme of All

First, the Bible is the most popular book in the world because it is continually dealing, from beginning to end, with God and religion. The human race, regardless of everything else, has always been and always will be profoundly interested in anything which deals with religion. Any publication which seriously treats of a Divine Being and of religious things will always create interest. When this treatment is based on a knowledge of God and religion which is profound and which comes from an experience not readily obtained, such a volume will create unusual interest. From first to last the theme of God—his nature, his powers, his desires, his treatment of humanity—runs throughout the entire Bible. It is simply saturated with the divine presence, and the definition of God throughout both the Old and New Testaments is of a character which appeals to the universal need. Here is a God unlike the god of the mythical ages, but a real everyday being who can be understood, respected and loved. The attributes which are given to God in the Bible are attributes which appeal to all men, and especially the great attributes of righteousness and love, which at once separate the God of the Bible from the gods of other books and other religions. The Bible would not be what it is, and would not appeal to all sorts and conditions of men, if a righteous God and a loving God and a real religion were not at the very foundation of all its pages.

The Bible is the most popular book in the world on account of the range of history which it covers, and especially two ranges: first, the beginning of the race in the creation of the world; and second, the period covered by the birth and life of Jesus Christ. The race will always be curious concerning its beginnings. The Bible is of the most intense interest to us, and always will be, because of what it says about the beginning and progress of historical life. This is on account of the fact that no knowledge on the part of men and women to-day is sufficient to give a true account of what happened at the beginning. The first chapter of Genesis, which marks the opening of the Bible, is of supreme interest to us, because none of us could ever write it, and no knowledge on our part could ever conserve it. The Bible, therefore, stands for a revelation which reaches back of common, ordinary human knowledge. The same thing is true also of that part of history which covers the story of our Lord. No human ingenuity, intellectual or imaginative, could ever create such a life. It is unique as it stands. In addition to these two unique historical writings, the entire history covered by the Bible is of the most fascinating character. It is continually opening up not only the story of the Jewish nation, but the story of all the peoples with which the Jewish nation had to deal, both in the old Eastern monarchies and the Roman Empire. In fact, nothing is more fascinating or rewarding than a study of contemporaneous history along with the study of Bible history. The periods covered by the writers were of the greatest importance to the whole world, and no other book except the Bible can be found which contains this amount of historical reference and interest.

The Fountain of Pure Literature

The Bible is the most popular book in the world on account of its pure literature. Say what we will concerning the advancement of modern methods of style and beauties of expression, I doubt if any one will ever approach some of the passages which can be found in the Psalms, in the Prophets, or in the Book of Revelation. Considering the fact that these writings have come to us through translations, it is astonishing what beauties and power have been preserved. There is no book quoted oftener than the Bible. Passages have been woven entire into our own literature. No writer of any prominence has ever been able to escape borrowing from the Bible. The reading of it has affected the style of writers like Ruskin and Browning and Milton. Gladstone repeatedly acknowledged his indebtedness to the Bible for his phraseology. Charles Fox said more than once that he owed to the perusal of the Bible his vocabulary. The variety of expression to be found on the part of different writers is strangely commingled with unity of expression due in large part to the fact that all of these men are writing with at least one great purpose in view. For we have in the Bible a style which is more or less uniform from beginning to end—even the style of expression. Different types of men with different tests in what we call literary methods are alike attracted to the Bible and are willing to call it the fountain head and source of vocal expression; and this is a remarkable fact: that if all other books were to be destroyed, any one who wished to perfect himself in the use of language, either written or spoken, might without much hesitation depend entirely upon the reading of the Bible and the incorporation of the language into his own thought. It would be safe to say that such a use of the Bible would result in a vocabulary and a style which would be, in a very large sense, a good education, and would actually determine the kind of speaker or writer the person was to be.

A Guide to the Conduct of Life

The Bible is the most popular book in the world because it lays down and explains rules for human conduct. The human race needs direction in order to live. It needs guideposts in order to tell it where to go, and the Bible, from beginning to end, through its biographies, through its comments on men's lives, and especially through its laying down of certain rules, is continually appealing to those who are in need of direction. This will always be the case. The fact that men long for some kind of authority is seen in the fact that there is a historical Pope. The fact that they need leadership is seen in the fact of ministers and schoolteachers; and men are glad to find something positive which has been proved by experience, and they want something definite by which to determine their conduct. They find this in the Bible and they always will find it. On this account the Bible is popular because it meets a universal need. No race or individual can do right or determine the great questions of right and wrong without knowing what the fundamental rules of conduct are. They are embodied so often and explained so clearly in the Bible that the human heart turns to them with a feeling of great relief. In other words, men want authority, and if this authority in the Bible is proved by the human consciousness as the ages move on, it is the best possible proof that the authority has a right to be there. Men are never going to conform their conduct to an indefinite, or shabby, or feeble, or false rule of life. It must be positive, and affirmative, and true.

The Bible is the most popular book in the world because it contains the biggest words in the world. It is continually dealing with words which spell the fundamental needs of humanity. Words that are found on nearly every page are God, sin, retribution, life, love, death, future, hell, heaven, right, wrong. These words can never lose their interest to the human race. They will always be big words. The ordinary book from the six best sellers is full of little words. It deals with some trivial chapter in some silly romance. It makes a great ado over some froth and foam on the top of the wave, but it never gets down into the depths. Last year's most popular book of fiction can hardly be found on the bookshelves of this year. Ten years from now even the title of it will be forgotten. The Bible will never be forgotten, because it continually deals with the great things of life—the things that make up the sum total of its happiness or misery, its life or death. It is dealing with man's relation to God and his fellow man. These are eternal facts which make the Bible eternal.

The Bible is the most popular book in the world because it contains the life of Jesus Christ. It is unique in this respect. Other books are written about this life. The Bible writes the life itself. The story is told by credible eye and ear witnesses. It is unimpeachable. It is evidence which any court of the present day would accept. If there were nothing else in the Bible but the life of Jesus in the four Gospels, it would probably be the most widely read book in the universe.

The Universal Teacher

The Bible is the most popular book in the world because it is absolutely positive in its teaching. You look in vain through its pages for question marks concerning life; or, if questions are raised, they are answered. The question marks have all been straightened out and make exclamation points. From beginning to end there is not a note of hesitation concerning the duty of man. It is the most positive of writings ever known; and it is on account of its positive character that the race has leaned upon it. Neither is this positiveness the note of dogmatism. All of its positive teaching is backed up by the facts in the case. It rests upon human experience. The positiveness of Jesus all rests upon an actual knowledge of human needs, and the remedy he offers for sin is positive because he thought and lived it out until it became as real as two times two are four. I think we have underestimated this tremendous and vital fact in the Bible. You may look through its pages from beginning to end to discover the weakness of interrogation so far as human conduct and destiny are concerned. It does not halt for one moment over the plain issues of life and death. "I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing. Therefore choose life." "If any man would know the teaching, let him do my will." There is nothing more positive in all the world than the statement that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

The Bible is the most popular book in the world because it is constantly reiterating, in every biography and every recital of history, the true relation of God to man, the relation of man to God, and the relation of men to one another. This covers the entire program of a whole human life from the cradle to the grave; and the fact that the Bible takes for granted in the New Testament that there is a future and that men's lives go on into it is also one great reason for the Bible's deathless existence. Men are not satisfied with one life here. They want a whole life. The assertion of this fact in the Bible stimulates and encourages and keeps alive the righteousness of the world. The Bible is the great text-book of life. Its teachings underlie all Statehood and state manship. Somewhere within its covers can be found directions for all sorts of situations in life. If its teachings were followed by commerce, industrial conflict would cease. If its teachings were followed by statesmen, poverty and drink and lust

THE AFTERGLOW

MAY the afterglow grow brighter
As the sands of life run low;
May the sweeter joys still linger,
Sending out a steady glow.

May I strive to fill each moment,
Every hour of the day,
With the choicest, sweetest treasures,
In my heart to store away.

May the afterglow be peaceful,
As my last sun sinks to rest;
As the shadows lengthen eastward,
May they lighten in the west.

May I sleep to waken yonder,
In a world from sorrow free;
With a clearer, purer vision
May its beauty dawn on me.

And this afterglow, this twilight,
Ere I pass from earth away,
May it but reflect the splendor
Of the bright and coming day.

could be rubbed off the map of the municipality, of the State and of the world. The teachings of the Bible embody the whole range of human need, both for the life which now is and for the life which is to come; and on this account it is the most popular book in the world and will continue to be. We need not fear for its popularity. What we have the privilege of doing is to turn that popularity into the largest possible uses. "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path." "Every Scripture inspired of God is also profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness; that the man of God may be complete, furnished completely unto every good work."

The Bible is the most popular book in the world because it contains the story of redemption. It is supremely the message of God to man. It is the great missionary publication of the heavens. It has in it the entire scope of man's regeneration. The first verse of the first book of the Bible begins with God, and the last verse of the last book in the Bible ends with Jesus Christ. "The grace of the Lord Jesus be with the saints." There is no book in the world which compares with the Bible in this one matter of redemption. We cannot conceive of a good many publications that we are hastily sending out from the press being printed in the other world; but it is not such a vast stretch of the imagination to conceive of the message of the Gospel being printed by the angels. Here is contained the undying statement of the love of God for men and the method by which they may approach him and be built up in him. The Bible is of all books in the world the spiritual volume containing within its printed words the bread of life. "Search the Scriptures; they are they which testify of me," said the Master, and as we turn its pages we feel like Peter when he said, "Lord, where shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life."

There are not many books in the world which are able to convert men, but the Bible holds the record among all publications of actually changing men's lives and purposes. It is the redemptive volume of the ages, and without it we would be in darkness indeed. Imagine, if you will, a world without a Bible and all that it contains in the way of instruction, inspiration and guidance, and we would be living in the dark ages. "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path." "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away," said the Master; and one reason why they shall not pass away is because they have been put into the printed form and the printed form has been impressed upon the tablets of the hearts of countless generations, and will continue so to be impressed as long as printing presses run and man reads.

The Domestic Economy of the Dogoods

By Eugene Thwing

MR. AND MRS. DOGOOD sat down one evening to study their financial problem together and to plan their system of domestic economy. "How to be happy though married" is an old puzzle. Many couples have sought the solution in many ways. Here is the way of the young Dogoods: "First of all, we must keep within our means. I am earning a decent income, but if we are not careful we shall be running ahead of it before we—"

"Tom! you know I am economical."

"Yes, of course you are, dearie; the same way I am. We like to have a good time, and we want everything nice. The thing to know is just how far we can indulge our tastes, and where we must restrain them."

"Well, I'll agree to go without—"

"Don't say it, my dear; suppose neither of us makes any hasty promises that we may want to break; but suppose we agree to this rule: Six dollars shall be set aside each week for helping poor families. Then we can't spend all our income on ourselves."

"Do we know any poor families who really need such help?"

"We can easily find them, if you agree to the plan." And the young wife replied at once, a little questioningly, but very sweetly and decisively, "Of course, Tom, I agree."

NEXT day the sturdy young business man visited the nearest police station. Could the captain tell him of some poor family in the neighborhood needing immediate help? Could he? In less than one minute a list was produced of families suffering from poverty, illness, or sudden accident, with brief particulars in each case. Two or three were selected, and Mr. and Mrs. Dogood started out to investigate.

The first home was desolate indeed. An ambulance had carried the husband and father away to the hospital two weeks ago, and he had not returned. The children were cold and hungry, and no wonder, with the temperature hardly above zero outside and a little stove inside which refused to give heat without coal; with the cupboard empty and no one to fill it; with mother sick and in despair because she could not work for her little ones.

"Tom! This is terrible! What in the world can we do with only six dollars against such a mountain of misery?" whispered the young wife, almost in tears.

"Well, dearie, six dollars isn't much, but surely it will buy some warmth and some food and a little medicine. Let's find out quickly how much it will do."

Yes, six dollars could do something, and that something meant the difference perhaps between life and death. But eager hearts and hands and quick mother instinct could do more. It was the combination of all these which changed the wretched place from a tomb to something like a home. It was these, together, that warmed and nourished the starved, freezing boides and kindled a glow of love in the hearts of those who gave even more than of those who received.

YOUNG MRS. DOGOOD had always been fond of a good play or the opera. Two dollars had never seemed so very much for a seat. Suddenly the idea occurred to her that, after all, the one-dollar seats were not so bad, and really the other dollar would help to replenish a certain little fund which always seemed to be too small. How it came about, or when, Mrs. Dogood hardly knew or noticed, but almost unconsciously she began to begrudge even one dollar for a ticket. It was possible to see and to hear in the gallery at fifty cents. What's the use of going so often, anyway? The other night she got to thinking of how those children would look in their new coats, and she missed some of the dialogue on the stage.

The price per yard of dress goods had never bothered Mrs. Dogood a great deal. She was surprised one day to catch herself choosing a cotton marquisette at fifty cents a yard for a house dress instead of a silk marquisette at a dollar seventy-five. She had really convinced herself that it would make up very prettily with the lace insertion in skirt and waist. A queer little tremor ran through her as she thought that she would be able to add at least ten dollars to her fund as a result of the saving on this single dress. She forgot to mention this little matter to Tom; but another discovery came, and with it a triumph that she could not keep to herself. When Mr. Dogood spoke in high admiration of a certain new hat, she confessed, with shining eyes, that she had only just found a hidden talent; that she could actually trim her own hats better than the French milliner.

THE domestic economy of the Dogoods gives them very little trouble now. There seems to be always a plenty of everything they need, and of everything in their own home that they want. The bills are always paid without difficulty or delay. Entertainment, alone or with friends, is more than abundant for all the time they can spare for it. Their home is a place of brightness and comfort. More than that, it is a place of pleasantness and peace, because both husband and wife are interested in and devoted to the same work. Their greatest enjoyment comes in their efforts to reproduce some of the comfort, the refinement and the happiness of their own home in the homes of those who have been unfortunate.

"Our most is so little, Tom, and there's so much need. Sometimes I really don't know which I am the most—discouraged, or eager for more work." And tired, loving little Mrs. Dogood sighs wistfully over the great problem of human misery.

"Never mind, my dear," says young Dogood as he gathers her hand in his across the table. "We can only brighten one little spot at a time in the darkness; but there are others who are making bright spots, and there will be still others, more and more. By and by there will be so many bright spots that they will come together, and all will be bright, and there will be no dark places left. Aren't you glad that we can make a little part, at least, of that brightness?"

"Yes, Tom."

THE GIVER

THE sun gives ever; so the earth,
What it can give, so much 'tis worth.
The ocean gives in many ways—
Gives paths, gives fishes, rivers, bays.
And so the air, it gives us breath;
When it stops giving, in comes death.
Give, give, be always giving;
Who gives not is not living;
The more you give, the more you live.

God's love hath to us wealth upheaped,
Only by giving is it reaped.
The body withers, and the mind,
If pent in by a selfish rind.
Give strength, give thought, give deeds, give self,
Give time, give prayers, but first give yourself.
Give, give, be always giving;
Who gives not is not living;
The more you give, the more you live.

Tracts as Soul-Winners

A TRACT reached the hands of the Rev. Richard Baxter, and he was led to Christ by it. He afterward wrote The Saints' Everlasting Rest, and that book aroused Philip Doddridge to come to the Saviour. Wilberforce was converted through Doddridge's book, Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, and then Wilberforce himself wrote Practical Christianity, a copy of which fell into the hands of Thomas Chalmers, who became a convert and a wonderful worker for humanity. These results, thus united in a chain, all came through one tract! Dr. Murray McCheyne was a great believer in tracts, so also was Dr. Marsham, of India, a vast number of whose natives came to Christ through tracts. When a boy, the Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, the great missionary to the Chinese, was brought to the Saviour through a tract, and as a consequence multitudes in China are happy in the Gospel to-day. The saintly George Mueller, with all his many activities, did not forget the printed page. During his lifetime he distributed over a million and a half of Bibles and Testaments, besides circulating millions upon millions of books and tracts, and vast numbers of people are on the way to heaven as the result. The printed page is the only means of reaching the majority of the people in the world with the Gospel.

REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, founder of the Christian Endeavor Society, who is now traveling in the Orient and who is writing for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a series of articles descriptive of his journeyings "In the Footsteps of St. Paul," sends this interesting letter from Asiatic Turkey:

THYATIRA, TURKEY, February 23, 1912.

I am writing from old Thyatira in Asia Minor, to say that I have been able already to visit three of the "Seven Churches" of Asia—Philadelphia, Sardis and Thyatira; and hope within a fortnight more to be able to reach Pergamos, Ephesus, Laodicea and Smyrna.

In spite of the political unrest and the fear of cholera, we are able to travel extensively in Macedonia, and have visited several of the cities of St. Paul, there and in Turkey in Asia as well; namely, Thessalonica, Berea, Philippi, Neapolis, Iconium and Lystra. In all of them I found much of interest, and Mrs. Clark was able to get many original pictures. I shall be able to send you the article about these places.

We are thankful for all these "journeying mercies." Faithfully yours,

FRANCIS E. CLARK.

MY JOURNEY TO THE SOUTH POLE

Copyright, 1912, by N. Y. Times

BY CAPTAIN ROALD AMUNDSEN

TAKING up the story of his trip from the date of the establishment of his winter quarters, Captain Amundsen has cabled:

On the 10th of February, 1911, we commenced to work our way toward the south, from that date to the 11th of April establishing three depots, which in all contained a quantity of provisions of about 3,000 kilos. One thousand six hundred kilos, including 1,100 kilos of seal meat, were cached in 80 degrees, 700 kilos in 81 degrees, and 800 kilos in 82 degrees south latitude. As no landmarks were to be seen, these depots were marked with flags, seven kilometers on each side in the easterly and westerly directions.

The ground and the state of the barrier were of the best, and specially well adapted to driving with dogs. On February 15, we had thus traveled about 100 kilometers. The weight of the sledges was 300 kilos, and the number of dogs was six for each sledge. The surface of the barrier was smooth and fine with no sastrugi [snow furrows thrown up by the wind]. The crevices were very local and were found dangerous in only two places. For the rest—long, smooth undulations. The weather was excellent—calm or a light breeze. The lowest temperature on these depot trips was minus 45 Celsius or centigrade (49 degrees below zero Fahrenheit). Before the arrival of winter we had 6,000 kilos of seal meat in the depots, enough for ourselves and 110 dogs. Eight dog houses, a combination of tents and snow huts, were built.

The "Fram" Just Before the Antarctic Trip Was Begun

Having cared for the dogs, the turn came to use our solid little hut. It was almost entirely covered with snow by the middle of April. First we had to get light and air. The Lux lamp, which had a power of 200 standard candles, gave us a brilliant light and kept the temperature up to 20 degrees Celsius (68 degrees Fahrenheit) throughout the winter, and our excellent ventilation system gave us all the air we wanted. In direct communication with the hut and dug-out on the barrier were workshops, packing-rooms, cellars for provisions, coal, wood, and oil, a plain bath, a steam bath, and observatories. Thus we had everything within doors if the weather should be too cold and stormy.

The sun left us on the 22d of April and did not return until four months later. The winter was spent in changing our whole outfit, which on the depot trips was found to be too clumsy and solid for the smooth surface of the barrier.

The sanitary conditions were of the best all the winter, and when the sun returned on the 24th of August he met the men sound in mind and body ready to set about the task. Already the day before, we had brought our sledges to the starting place for our march toward the south. Only in the beginning of September did the temperature rise to such an extent that there was any question of setting out.

Only in the middle of October spring came in earnest. Seals and birds appeared. The temperature was steady between minus 20 and 30 Celsius (4 degrees and 22 degrees below zero Fahrenheit).

The original plan that all of us should go toward the south had been changed. Five men had to do this work, while the other three were to start for the east and visit King Edward VII Land. On October 20 the southern party started—five men, four sledges, fifty-two dogs, and provisions for four months—everything in excellent order.

We had made up our minds to take the first part of the trip as easily as possible, in order to give ourselves and the dogs a rational training, and on the 23d we made our depot in 80 degrees south. We went right ahead. In spite of the dense fog an error of two to three kilometers happened only once in a while, but we were caught by the flagmarks and found these on our way without difficulty. Having rested and fed the dogs on all the seal meat they were able to eat, we started again on the 26th, with the temperature steadily between minus 20 and 30 Celsius (4 degrees and 22 degrees below zero Fahrenheit).

From the start it was the intention not to drive more than 30 kilometers a day, but it appeared that this was too little for our strong, willing animals. At 80 degrees south we began to build snow cairns of a man's height, in order to have marks on our return trip. On the 31st we reached the depot at 81 degrees, and stopped there one day, and fed the dogs on as much pemmican as they wanted. We reached the depot at 82 degrees on the 5th of November, where the dogs for the last time got all they wanted to eat. On the 8th, southward again, with a daily march of 50 kilometers.

The trip from 82 degrees to 83 degrees became a pleasure trip—excellent ground, fine sledging, and an even temperature. On the 9th we sighted South Victoria Land and the continuation of the mountain range which Sir Ernest Shackleton mentioned in his chart as running toward the southeast from the Beardmore Glacier, and on the same day we reached 83 degrees and established here Depot No. 4. On the 11th we made the interesting discovery that the Ross Barrier terminated in a bight toward the southeast at 86 degrees south latitude and 163 degrees west longitude, formed between the southeast mountain range running from South Victoria Land and a range on the opposite side running in a southwesterly direction—probably a continuation of King Edward VII Land.

On the 13th we reached 84 degrees, where we established a depot; on the 16th we were at 85 degrees, where, also, we made a depot. From our winter quarters, "Framheim," we had been marching due south. On the 17th of November, at 85 degrees, we arrived at a place where the land and barrier were connected. The barrier here rises in undulations for about 300 feet. Some few big crevices indicated the limited boundary. Here we made our head depot, taking provisions for sixty days and leaving thirty days' provisions behind.

The land under which we lay and which we now had to attack looked quite imposing. The nearest summits along the barrier had a height from 2,000 to 10,000 feet, but several others farther south were 15,000 feet or more. The next day we began the climb. The first part of it was an easy task—light slopes and well-filled mountain sides. It did not take a long time, for our willing dogs worked their way up. Farther up, we met with some small but very steep glaciers. Here we had to harness twenty dogs to each sledge and take the four sledges in two turns. In some places it was so steep that it was difficult enough to use our skis. The first day we climbed 2,000 feet, the next day mostly up some small glaciers, camping at a height of 4,500 feet. The third day we were obliged to go down on a mighty glacier, "Axel Heiberg's Glacier," which divided the coast mountains farther south.

The next day began the longest part of our climb. Many detours had to be made in order to avoid broad cracks and open crevices. These were apparently mostly filled up, as the glaciers in all probability had long ago stopped moving, but we had to be very careful, never knowing for certain how thick was the layer that covered them. Our camp that night lay in very picturesque surroundings at a height of 5,000 feet. The glacier here was narrowed in between the two 15,000 feet high mountains, the "Frithiof Nansen" and the "Don Pedro Christophersen." From the bottom of the glacier rose Mount "Ole Englstad," a big snow cone 13,500 feet high. The glacier was very much broken in this comparatively narrow pass. The mighty crevices seemed to stop us from going farther, but it was not so serious as it appeared. Our dogs, which up to this time had covered a distance of about 700 kilometers, the last day's very hard work, ran this day 35 kilometers, the ascent being 5,600 feet, an almost incredible record.

It took us only four days from the barrier to get up on the vast inland plateau. We camped that night at a height of 10,600 feet. Here we had to kill thirty-four of our brave companions and keep eighteen—six for each of our three sledges. We stopped here four days on account of bad weather. Tired of this, we set out on the 25th of November. On the 26th, in a furious blizzard and in a dense snowdrift, absolutely nothing was to be seen, but we felt that, contrary to expectations, we were going fast down hill. The hypsometer gave us that day a descent of 600 feet.

We continued our march the next day in a gale, and a dense snowdrift got our faces badly frozen. We could see nothing. We reached that day 86 degrees, dead reckoning. The hypsometer indicated a fall of 800 feet. The next day was similar. The weather cleared a little at dinner time and exposed to our view a mighty mountain range to the east, not far off—only for a moment—and then it disappeared in the dense snowdrift. On the 29th it calmed down and the sun shone, though it was not the only pleasant surprise he gave. In our course stretched a big glacier running toward the south. At its eastern end was the mountain range going in a southeasterly direction. Of the western part of it no view was to be had, it being hidden in the dense fog. At the foot of this glacier, the "Devil's Glacier," a depot for six days was established, at 86.21 degrees south latitude. The hypsometer indicated 8,000 feet above sea level.

On November 30 we began to climb the glacier. The lower part of it was very much broken and

OUR FIRST WOMEN'S EXHIBITION

Mrs. Theo. A. Janeway

"Little Mothers" Being Taught Hygienic Laundering

Mrs. Henry F. Dimock
Pres. Washington Memoral Asso'n

THE first Woman's Industrial Exhibition, under the auspices of ten leading American organizations, embracing philanthropic, patriotic and civic interests, among them being the New York Girls' Industrial School and George Washington Memorial Association, is now in progress at the new Grand Central Palace in New York City. The exhibition is presided over by prominent New York ladies and will cover a period of ten days. Mrs. Taft, Mrs. Dix, wife of the Governor of New York; Mrs. Gaynor, wife of the Mayor of New York City, and other prominent women assisted at the opening ceremonies.

Foremost among the exhibits of this unique undertaking are a model laundry, where a dozen "little women" perform elaborate laundry work in an up-to-date and expeditious manner. The energetic woman who is responsible for the inspiration of the model laundry took a course in Economical Household at a Western normal college where, among other things of value to the housekeeper, she learned the advantage of sun-dried clothes and household linen, and various scientific ways of managing the homely art of laundering. She has now a three-acre farm upon which her model laundry is operated, and an office in the city where orders are received.

The rendezvous of the exhibition is the "Temple of Fashion," peopled by living models wearing dresses, wraps and suits of purely American design. A demonstrator describes correct attire, and gives lectures on the history of dress from medieval times to the present. A Japanese tea garden is presided over by native women in the costumes of their country. Women decorators and householders have an especially interesting and elaborate display. This section includes a kitchenette, a bijou boudoir, a hygienic sleeping porch, model indoor bedroom, suggestive combination dining-room and living-room, furniture and furnishings adapted for bachelor quarters, a house beautiful, and a bungalow converted into a comfortable farmhouse. The entire reconstruction of an abandoned farm on economic and picturesque lines is also shown.

A hat shop, flower shop, and old-fashioned candy shop are variously presided over by women successful in these lines of business. There are also a book-mender who rebinds old books and sheet music, replacing disfigured pages by copying others in the exact types necessary; a book-plate maker, a jewelry designer, and a doll's dressmaker. Another up-to-date, self-supporting woman has discovered a heretofore unguessed process of making vegetable dyes, and has worked up a large trade among Oriental tapestry and rug dealers, largely because threads colored with her dyes can be successfully used for mending and piecing fabrics of Oriental manufacture. A miniature painter of animals has a very popular booth, and one young woman is picturesquely surrounded by upwards of fifty puppets dressed in various costumes typical of certain periods of society in Europe and in the Orient.

Decidedly the most elaborate section is devoted to the exhibit of the George Junior Republic, the model self-governing community of boys and girls in Ithaca, N. Y. Upwards of one-third of the citizens in this model community are young girls in possession of the suffrage and eligible for holding office. The exhibit includes miniature reproductions of three of the main buildings of the republic—the Government Building, where every week court is held; the store, which is the main gathering-place for the girls and boys; and Carter Cottage, known in the settlement as the "White House," because most of the government officials have quarters there. Various industrial and agricultural activities of the institution are shown in a series of stereopticon views.

The first Woman's Exhibition in America marks a new stage in the affairs of women, and demonstrates many ways in which women are earning livings. The exhibition exploits the progress of twenty years of woman's work and illustrates, besides the ordinary ways of self-support open to the sex, many unusual avenues of resource, originality and individuality for bread-winning women.

MY JOURNEY TO THE SOUTH POLE

dangerous. Moreover, the snow bridges [over the crevices] very often burst. From our camp that night we had a splendid view over the mountain to the east. There was "Helmer Hansen's Summit," the most remarkable of them all. It was 12,000 feet high and covered with such broken glaciers that in all probability no foothold was to be found. "Oscar Wisting's," "Sverre Hassel's," and "Olav Hjanland's" mountains also lay here, beautifully illuminated in the rays of the bright sun.

It took us three days to surmount the Devil's Glacier, always in misty weather. On the 1st of December we left this broken glacier, with holes and crevices without number, with its height of 9,100 feet. Before us, looking, in the mist and snowdrift, like a frozen sea, appeared a light, sloping ice plateau filled with small hummocks.

The walk over this frozen sea was not pleasant. The ground under us was quite hollow, and it sounded as though we were walking on the bottoms of empty barrels. As it was, a man fell through, then a couple of dogs. We could not use our skis on this polished ice. Sledges had the best of it. The place got the name, the "Devil's Dancing Room." This part of our march was the most unpleasant. On December 6 we got our greatest height, according to the hypsometer and aneroid, 10,750 feet, at 87 degrees 40 minutes south.

On December 8 we came out of the bad weather. Once again the sun smiled down on us. Once again we could get an observation. Before us lay an absolutely plain plateau, only here and there marked with tiny sastrugi. In the afternoon we passed 88 degrees 23 minutes (Shackleton's farthest south was 88 degrees 25 minutes). We camped and established our last depot, No. 10. From 88 degrees 25 minutes the plateau began to slope down very gently and smoothly toward the other side.

On the 9th of December we reached 88 degrees 39 minutes; on December 10, 88 degrees 56 minutes; December 11, 89 degrees 15 minutes; December 12, 89 degrees 30 minutes; December 13, 89 degrees 45 minutes. Up to this time the observations and dead reckoning agreed remarkably well, and we made out that we ought to be at the Pole on December 14 in the afternoon.

That day was a beautiful one—a light breeze from southeast, the temperature minus 23 Celsius (9.4 degrees below zero Fahrenheit), and the ground and sledging were perfect. The day went along as usual, and at three P.M. we made a halt. According to our reckoning we had reached our destination. All of us gathered around the colors—a beautiful silk flag—all hands taking hold of it and planting it. The vast plateau on which the Pole is standing got the name of the "King Haakon VII Plateau." It is a vast plain, alike in all directions. Mile after mile during the night we circled around the camp.

In the fine weather we spent the following day taking a series of observations from six A.M. to seven P.M. The result gave us 89 degrees 55 minutes. In order to observe the Pole as close as possible we traveled, as near south as possible, the remaining nine kilometers. On December 16 there we camped. It was an excellent opportunity. There was a brilliant sun. Four of us took observations every hour of the day's twenty-four hours. The exact result will be the matter of a professional private report.

This much is certain—that we observed the Pole as close as it is in human power to do it with the instruments we had—a sextant and an artificial horizon. On December 17, everything was in order on the spot. We fastened to the ground a little tent we had brought along, a Norwegian flag, and the Fram pendant on the top of it. The Norwegian home at the South Pole was called "Polheim." The distance from our winter quarters to the Pole was about 1,400 kilometers, and the average march 25 kilometers a day.

We started on the return trip on the 17th of December. Unusually favorable weather made our way home considerably easier than the journey to the Pole. We arrived at our winter quarters, "Framheim," on the 25th of January, 1912, with two sledges and eleven dogs, all well.

General Notes

—THERE IS A PROSPECT that a substantial wage increase will soon be granted to 300,000 textile workers in the New England mills. A five per cent. increase has already been announced to 35,000 mill hands in Maine and New Hampshire; 36,000 in Massachusetts will soon have a similar increase. In Lawrence, Mass., the strike is gradually being settled by conferences between representatives of the strikers and the manufacturers in Boston, and a like increase in wages is expected to result.

—ON MARCH 10 Yuan Shi Kai, who had been induced to reconsider his decision regarding the provisional presidency of China, was inaugurated into that office in the presence of a great gathering of provincial envoys, military and naval officers and delegates. Only a few days after this the dispatches announced that General Sheng Yun, governor of the province of Shensi, had taken possession of the provinces of Honan and Chili and was advancing upon Peking, burning and slaying as he went. The general has a force of about 10,000 Manchus and has declared his intention of replacing the Emperor upon the throne. Canton is again the scene of fighting and pillage. Under the leadership of three famous pirates about 28,000 men are terrorizing the entire section, even firing upon the foreign shipping in the harbor. So far as can be learned these brigands are associated with neither party.

Lenten Remembrance

MANY devout people care little for the fixed celebrations of the church year. They feel that throughout the year the birth, the death, the resurrection of the Saviour should be contemplated and the blessings of these sacred events appropriated. They feel that all possible sacrifice should be made for him every day, all possible service rendered. And they are undeniably right. But many others, equally devout, experience special help and blessing from contemplating and celebrating certain sacred events in special ways.

It is impossible for a mother to be as jubilant on the anniversary of the death of one son as she is on the birthday of another. So Lent has grown out of this intense feeling of sympathy with our Lord for the great distress of the last days of his life in the flesh and for the agony of his death.

Even out through the world there has crept something of this same awe. People who may forget Christ on almost every other day think of him on Good Friday. He was so good, so pure, so great that the world feels a catch in its breath on this day that commemorates his death. Half-hearted followers of his, who still like to be called by his name, are thoughtful and careful during these weeks of sacred association and on this day of grievous memory.

Since this is so it is a lamentable and dangerous thing that the daily papers of the metropolis have had reason to call attention to "Lenten Revels," by which they mean the extraordinary events of gaiety and folly with which worldly people are trying during this Lenten season to amuse themselves. It may be that those who are giving themselves this year to more careless abandon in seeking pleasure do not mean any offense to the church and its Founder. But it may be otherwise. It may be that the memory of Jesus and of his sacrificial sorrow is growing dimmer in the minds of men. And there could be no greater peril than this to any city or to any nation.

These "Lenten Revels" should be met with Lenten sermons of rebuke and warning, with Lenten testimonies to the present power of the eternal Saviour, with a Lenten passion of prayer and endeavor that sinners may be saved.

Half-Hearted Christians

HOW may I know that I am a Christian?" is a question frequently asked, and it is one which many find difficult to answer. If a man search his own heart; if he look deep down into the story of his life that lies hidden there, and is mindful of his doubts, his struggles, his many failures and his feeble faith, he will hesitate to lay claim to the name which would rank him as a true disciple of the Master. He has tried, though weakly, to follow Christ. He has been filled with intense longings for a sign whereby he will know that he has been accepted. With all his desire, he cannot justify himself. He knows that his zeal is lukewarm, that his heart takes little delight in the Word, and that he is still afar off and weak in faith and too easily overcome by the world. He is what Professor David Smith has aptly called a "sick Christian."

There is but one remedy for such a case: It is simply to give your heart to Christ unreservedly. Let your own estimate of your shortcomings and imperfections go, and lay hold on Jesus with the simple faith of a child. Take him at his word, never doubting. He has promised to heal the wounded heart, to restore the sick soul, to give spiritual strength and courage for weakness and timidity. He knows your needs and will supply them all. Cease measuring yourself, analyzing your imperfections and bewailing your unrighteousness. Come just as you are, with all your unworthiness, and he will give you the assurance you need. Leave it all to him; trust absolutely. Ask him to guide and enlighten you, to carry your burdens and to give you new courage. You have the gracious assurance in his own words that he will not fail you. Whoso trusts most honors most. Remember, too, that your surrender cannot be complete until you literally give up the effort to save yourself and let him do it. Take his yoke upon you and he will lift the burden. Then, when you have ceased to fight the hopeless battle alone and have left it all with him, go out and confess him openly and begin to help others. Find something, somewhere, somehow, to do for him, and in the doing you will find, to your joy and astonishment, that though you gave up the battle, he has won it for you! Your surrender will be your triumph.

The Better Way

THERE is a pleasing contrast in the methods adopted by the women suffragists in England and those of their American sisters. Over there, they seem to have lost their heads in their ardent and sensational efforts to make a strong impression upon the English government and people; here, on the other hand, their demonstrations are marked by orderliness and their campaign is conducted on conservative lines that do not offend good taste. Their march on Albany, Trenton and Washington was spectacular and impressive, and the presentation of arguments before the legislatures, State and national, showed tact and good generalship. While the "Violent Sisterhood" abroad is throwing away the chances of success and greatly postponing the day of victory, the women of America are marching along on safe ground, recognizing the principle that nothing is to be won by excess and that whatever is accomplished must come through the legitimate channels of education, agitation and legislation.

Fidelity Versus Fussiness

FORESTALLING a shower of letters which would otherwise be almost sure to arrive, this opportunity is taken of saying something about the story, "An Interlude," by Mabel Nelson Thurston, which appears in this issue. The editors rather hesitated to publish it, fearing that many faithful housewives would think their punctilious fidelity to routine drudgery had been criticized. But we felt the message of the story to be wholesome, so put it into type.

When the whole story of American achievement is told, no class will be awarded higher praise than the careworn, toil-bent mothers who have taken upon their shoulders and upon their hearts the burdens of home-making and home-keeping. The fires that have been kindled, the buckwheat cakes, the bread, the pies, the roasts and stews that have been cooked, the dishes, the pans and pots that have been washed, the rolls of butter that have been made, the rooms that have been swept and dusted, the socks and coats that have been darned and patched, the lamps that have been trimmed, these and countless other things that have been faithfully made and tended and served and done—these are the things that have made America possible. For from homes thus faithfully kept have come the brains and the brawn that spell America.

But fidelity, not only in the housewife, but in any other toiler, can pass on into fussiness. In the little details of the daily drudgery the quieter, deeper, higher matters of the mind and heart may be forgotten. And our charming little story of the "Interlude" is a gentle rebuke to such a habit. The daily routine must never be made the goal, the idol, the final law. Sometimes, truly, it is so pressing and so hard that it is difficult to see beyond it, but there must be times when the mind is thrust above it, the heart throbs through it, when the quiet words are heard again, "Man shall not live by bread alone."

Some conviction like this lies back of the terrific unrest throughout the labor circles of the world. Men feel that it is not fair to be so strained and so bound that they shall have no time to read and to play. But this very bondage is sometimes suffered unnecessarily; there is no greater need of doing such a task at such a time in such a way than the demands of fussiness. When this is the case, it is time to take an afternoon off and go to Ripton's Falls.

Amundsen's Splendid Triumph

IN THIS issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we print by special arrangement the story of explorer Roald Amundsen's wonderful journey to the South Pole. This narrative, coming fresh from the explorer's own pen, will pass into history as the record of an achievement which deserves to be remembered through all time. America can well afford to congratulate Norway on the event. With Peary's triumph at the North Pole and Amundsen's at the South, the glory of conquest in the Arctic and Antarctic belongs indisputably to the two nations that have already done so much in exploration and discovery. Amundsen's tale of his gallant struggle southward over the frozen wastes, grips the heart with strong human interest, altogether apart from what it may contribute to the world's stock of geographical and meteorological knowledge. It thrills us to think of the splendid dash in which three nations contested for the honors of first discovery. Now that the victor's wreath has fallen to the son of Norway—who has shown the spirit of the old vikings—we may be sure none of his rivals will begrudge him the honors so fairly won. There will be no quarrel among the competitors, like that which unfortunately followed the close of the Arctic quest. And what a magnificent thing it would be to learn that all three of them had reached the goal!

China's Turmoil

THESE are troublous times for the new republic of China. President Yuan, on taking the oath of office as provisional head of the republic, finds conditions which would discourage most statesmen; but he is experienced and resourceful. Three hundred million dollars is needed to pay the troops, to rehabilitate the government, to reconstruct the system of internal revenues, and to develop the country's resources. Efforts are being made to secure a loan through foreign bankers. Disturbances in the interior are being suppressed with an iron hand. There is still a considerable army loyal to the old régime. Peking is an armed camp, and missionary compounds and legations are under guard. Looters are disposed of in large numbers by summary execution. To the new republic these days of transition are full of peril. North and South do not seem to be pulling together. It may take weeks, and even months, before the machinery of the new government is in smooth working order and before the country can be tranquilized; but the progress that is being made is in the right direction. Let us hope that, under wise leadership, the crisis may pass over, and that a brighter and happier day may soon dawn for China.

General Booth Visits Holland

GENERAL WILLIAM BOOTH, founder and head of the Salvation Army, bade farewell to the officers, soldiers and friends of the Salvation Army at the Liverpool Street Station in London recently on his departure for Holland, where an evangelistic tour has been arranged for him. The dispatches give accounts of the opening of the Dutch campaign in Rotterdam. Meetings were held in the Doelen, where the General addressed an audience of the best people in the city of about a half million population. Rev. Dr. Callenbach, of the State church, speaking at the close of the meeting, referred to the venerable leader as a volcano, snow capped, but with a heart of fire burning inside. General Booth in his own language has well-nigh perfectly described the work of the Salvation Army as a reason for public support. These are among them: "The helping of the friendless and helpless and despairing, and doing it for both worlds; that is, helping them out of the hell they suffer here, and away from the hell that awaits the ungodly hereafter. The holding of 85,000 meetings, outdoors and in, every week. The million homes visited every week. The efforts made to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, nurse the sick, house the homeless, provide work for the workless, drag the poor lost women out of their haunts of abomination, give the criminals another chance, hunt the runaway and deserted children out of the streets, and a hundred other things, all culminating in the salvation of the soul, a holy, useful life, and the paradise of God." General Booth, a colossal moral figure and reformer of modern times, has had such a vital relation to God's Holy Spirit that a miracle of redemption has been wrought among the submerged, unchurched classes in the span of his lifetime, as he and his people have obeyed Christ's command:

Go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in. (Luke 14: 23.)

General William Booth Saying Good-by to His Officers and Friends

Opening Cycle Season Easter

CYCLE racing for the season at the Newark Veldrome is announced to begin on Easter. The feature professional race for the opening carnival will be the Shanley Handicap at one mile, which will carry $200 in prize money. The program for the Sunday following will outdo the Easter meet in the amount of money offered—$1,000 in prizes. The world's championships will be held on this Newark track August 25 and 28 and September 1, seven or eight nations beside our own participating. The unhappy and censurable feature of the whole meet is the studied plan to celebrate the festival of Christ's resurrection with this open and notorious infraction of God's law, and the laws of most of the States of the Union, based upon one of God's commandments. The wheeling is all right and the meets are all right when conducted at the proper times and in a proper manner. But arranging to start on Easter for a season of defiance against the laws of God and man is all wrong. This cutting of the Sabbath law into ribbons by wheels of one kind or another and by sport of one kind or another is a real danger to the Republic, and a menace to our civilization. To endure calmly these impositions is to invite the condemnation of the prophet of old:

Thou hast despised mine holy things, and hast profaned my Sabbaths. (Ezek. 22: 8.)

Pays Back Boyhood Theft

IN 1873 a fifteen-year-old boy stole $40 from the Sunday School fund of the Baptist Chapel in Brooklyn. The stolen money became the foundation of a fortune. The boy—now a man of fifty-three years—is one of the wealthiest citizens of Western Pennsylvania. But with advancing age his money has become the burden of his life. The misdeed that got him the first dollars has tainted all. In order to purge his conscience he now offers to give every cent of his fortune to the church which he robbed. Dr. Wallace, who was in charge of the chapel when the Sunday School robbery was committed, thirty-eight years ago, has been asked to indicate what amount the rich man shall pay back to the church. He remembers the boy who stole the $40—a bright, high-spirited youngster, who one day met with an unexpected chance and temptation to obtain enough money to get out and see the world. The boy vanished utterly. None of the church people heard from him until a few days ago when his letter to Dr. Wallace arrived. The letter told of the theft and the writer said that he first made his way to California, and with the few dollars that remained to him after he got there he struggled along until he found work. He "made good." He obtained better places in rapid succession. Soon he was able to go into business for himself. In those days, the joy of success and the forgetfulness of youth kept his conscience from worrying him about his one crime. He had accumulated a goodly sum of money and considerable property when he decided some years ago to engage in a new enterprise. He moved to the oil district of Pennsylvania. Again fortune favored him. His possessions became greater and greater—his position more and more distinguished. He is to-day a power in the community where he lives. There is probably not one of his acquaintances who would believe that this man stole the foundation of his riches. This man, after the fever of money-getting had cooled down, had the disposition and time for reflection, and looking backward he saw that wicked act at the beginning of his career, and it gave him pain. He knew he could not get any relief until he had humbled his pride in confession and restitution. He had the time and disposition to look forward also into the life beyond and to a day of settlement where injustices and fraud without sorrow and reform are outside of the bounds of mercy, and where the thief unforgiven shall go to his place. There are some sins where restitution is impossible, but where it is possible, it should be made for peace of conscience here and happiness hereafter. When the unpopular tax-gatherer touched the life of Christ, he wanted to make restitution.

If I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, I restore him fourfold. (Luke 19: 8.)

To Stop Telephone Leaks

PHILIP LAVERY, aged twenty, a mill worker in Webster, Mass., recently got $17,000 for his rights in a device now in the patent office at Washington, to prevent a third person from overhearing the conversation of two people talking over the telephone. He sold it to the New England Telephone and Telegraph Company, whose mechanics had worked in vain for years to perfect such an invention. We are under the impression that there are similar inventions used by some companies. He who has made any improvement in this direction is a servant of the public good. In olden times few persons were held in greater contempt than those who secreted themselves in the eavesdrop of a house to listen clandestinely to the conversation of others. To this class the telephone eavesdroppers of to-day belong. The disposition to nose into somebody's else business, the baser desire to get hold of some information of a questionable character to be used for scandal, make sneaks of some who make great pretensions to respectability or virtue. The one who burns down the barn or house is not meaner than he who would stand with the eye to the keyhole, or the ear to the telephone wire, to steal information to be used in destroying the reputation of their fellow men. The pen of the wise man has pretty well described these mischief makers:

A hypocrite with his mouth destroyeth his neighbor. (Prov. 11: 9.)

Translated at His Post

REV. GEORGE MORTON, of Allentown, Pa., a former co-worker with Moody and Sankey, a veteran of the Civil War, an old friend of Mark Twain, and a devout and ripe student of the Scripture, was teaching a Bible class the other evening when he was stricken with apoplexy and was gathered to his fathers. We are all shocked at the news of a sudden death, and yet that is often a befitting way to go—to drop while in the track of duty. We ought to live each day as though it were our last, and also each day as though we were going to remain. It would be well, if there should be sudden death in store for any of us, that it might find us as nearly in the discharge of duty as the minister teaching the saving truths of the Bible to others. This veteran had the same faith Enoch had, a translating process lifting the soul out of sin into holiness, and from earth into heaven.

By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and he was not found, because God had translated him. (Heb. 11: 5.)

Great Discoveries at Pompeii

FURTHER remarkable discoveries have been made in the ruins of Pompeii. A street leading to the Forum, which was closed at both ends by stone pillars to exclude chariots, now proves to have been one of the chief thoroughfares of the city It is lined with shops, the walls of which show inscriptions and marble tablets, which are well preserved. The excavators have come upon several balconies, one of which, the first to be unearthed, is complete. Five skeletons have been found. Apparently they are the bones of persons overcome while attempting to escape from the eruption. A most interesting discovery is that of a complete wineshop, with bronze and glass amphorae, bronze lamps, and an ivory safe, which contained a quantity of silver coins. Many frescoes and an electoral inscription have been uncovered. How strangely has the spade of the archæologist verified the statement of the pen of inspiration! The destruction caused by volcanoes has been graphically described by the prophet:

And the streams thereof shall be turned into pitch, and the dust thereof into brimstone, and the land thereof shall become burning pitch. It shall not be quenched night nor day; the smoke thereof shall go up forever: from generation to generation it shall lie waste. (Isa. 34: 9, 10.)

AN INTERLUDE

BY MABEL NELSON THURSTON

AND,'Mira!—Hold on a minute, Hiram!—Don't you forget the Indian pudding! I put it into the oven before breakfast this morning, so's you wouldn't have to make it this afternoon; it ought to be done before your ironing fire is up, but you'll have to watch it, or it'll scorch quicker'n you can turn around."

Mrs. Spaulding, a detaining hand upon the reins, leaned across Hiram, her capable face full of unwonted concern. 'Mira, in the kitchen doorway, nodded assurance.

"I'll look at it right away," she promised.

"And your father's bitters—I forgot to tell him about them. I made some fresh and put them in the west room closet; you'll have to be real firm with him, 'Mira, or he'll slip out of taking them. It's a tablespoonful before each meal, you know."

"I'll remind him," 'Mira promised again.

"And Judy Peters will bring the quinces Wednesday. I left the money for them in the green sugarbowl. You can—"

A sharp turn of the wagon snapped the sentence in two. Hiram had regained mastery of the situation. The old creaking carryall, intermittent stage for South Meadows' infrequent travelers, jolted down the road, scattering a trail of vigorous protest upon the part of its passenger.

'Mira stood watching until it vanished from sight; then she gave a bewildered glance about the landscape, which, bereft of its central figure, suddenly revealed an unfamiliar face. Never within Mira's memory had her mother left home before, and the world seemed somehow to have stopped; there was a large emptiness as if the clocks had fallen to silence within the house—a feeling as if time had ceased.

Still, with the bewilderment heavy upon her, the girl stepped back into the kitchen. It was a large, low, pleasant room, full of the indescribable charm of a place enriched by years of intimate living. Though the September day was going to be a warm one, there was a pleasant breeze lifting the grape leaves at the south windows, and the ironing fire was not yet disagreeably manifest. The ironing-table was standing ready for the morning's work, the basket of crisp, sweet-sunned clothes beneath. 'Mira, with a sigh, lifted out a roll of towels and began sprinkling them; all her life it had seemed to her that ironing days came upon the loveliest days of the week. Once when a little girl, one magnificent day of June glories, she had begged her mother to go down into the fields; she had learned then that ironing days are no more to be shifted at will than the Sabbath. Later she learned that the same inevitableness attached to washing and churning and baking and mending and cleaning days. It seemed to her, then, a strange arrangement of life which filled all the hours with ordered tasks and left nothing but a few rare minutes for moods and whims. But that was when she was very young and had not learned that the aim of existence was to fill time, and that only the shiftless ever allow time to fill itself.

The girl's fingers worked more and more slowly, letting the drops fall idly from them. She was thinking—nothing but hard thoughts ever made 'Mira's fingers slow; usually she was swift as a bird. Suddenly she stopped, her breath coming excitedly, and her eyes lighting at her thought. The next second she had whirled the towels into a roll, flung them into the basket, and was dashing across the road. At the barn door she paused, eyes and thoughts too dazzled to penetrate the gloom within, but her impatience refusing to wait.

"Father," she called breathlessly, "are you there?" Then she discovered him and darted to his side.

"Did mother get off all right?" he asked.

"Yes," she nodded, "she got off. Father, how many years have you had Indian pudding for supper Tuesday nights?"

"How many years?" he repeated perplexedly.

"Yes," she agreed. "Has it been ever since you were married?"

"Well, yes," he answered consideringly, "I reckon it has. Your mother she calculated 'twas an easy thing to have on ironing days."

"Do you," the girl panted, "do you like Indian pudding so very much? So much that you'd be disappointed if you didn't have it? Think, father, please!"

Her father, dropping his pitchfork to the floor, leaned upon it, meditating. He had a thin, lined face with gentle, faded eyes, and slender, stooping shoulders. The whole man had the effect of fine goods faded by wear.

"There was times along at first," he said with slow reminiscence, "that I'd think I never could tech another mouthful of it. Seemed as if something inside me rose up against it. But your mother she maintained 'twas good and wholesome, and I'd get used to it, and so I have. Your mother'd take the prize at managing, 'Mira."

"Yes," the girl agreed hastily. The moments were too golden to waste in self-evident statements. "Yes, I know. Father, back there, when you used to hate Indian pudding, you know, what did you think you'd like? Think hard, father!"

Her father glanced at her whimsically, a trace of humor kindling a blue flash in his eyes.

"There was times," he declared, "when I used to think I'd give a hard day's work for a good, juicy apple dumpling. But 'twas long ago—I've almost forgotten what they taste like now."

'Mira flashed across to him and laid her fingers lightly on his lips. "No, you haven't, father," she protested. "Don't spoil it—don't! All these years you've wanted one—you just wait and see, when you come to dinner this noon." And before he could answer, she was skimming across the road.

Back in the kitchen she cast a swift glance about, planning her day. The roll of towels caught her eye, and she snatched up a flatiron; then, with sudden memory of the Indian pudding, she put it down and opened the oven door. The pudding was perfection, and the room filled with its spicy odor. 'Mira looked at it half regretfully as she set it by the pantry window to cool.

"It seems almost a shame not to eat it," she said.

The towels came next, and were turned off with reckless speed; after which she dragged the clothes basket into the unused east chamber, returned the ironing-board to its place, and set back the irons. Then at last the day was cleared for action. She stood a moment in the center of the room, and flung out her arms in sheer abandonment of joy.

"Oh!" she cried, "There's two whole days!" To her eager spirit it was an eternity for adventuring.

She flashed into the closet for a pan—all her natural swiftness was intensified for the saving of her day—and then with happy feet she took the orchard path. It was wonderful there in the deep summer morning, and she hurried no longer. Instead, she dropped down in the grass, and, clasping her hands about her knees, gazed with happy eyes upon her kingdom. The trees all thrifty, and bearing the heavy burdens of a great apple year, stood at generous distances apart, their cool pools of shadow lying restfully upon the vivid green grass between. Above, in the interlacing branches, was a constant fluttering of birds—chickadees and bluebirds and a little downy woodpecker tapping up and down on a hollow branch. Below them, tiny gauzy creatures whirled through their brief lives. Occasionally came the dull thud of a falling apple; now and then a leaf wavered through the air.

For an hour the girl sat almost motionless, harvesting the joy of the denied years; but finally she rose with a long sigh of fulfilled content. It was over, but there were hours yet to be filled to the brim. She picked up her pan and made her way slowly across to a tree of small, spicy early apples. When she had gathered enough for her need she still wandered about, reluctant to turn so happy a page, till, warned by the shortening shadows, she remembered her father's dinner, and fled to the house. The fire had grown low—when before had the fire ever grown low upon ironing day? The girl laughed as she pulled out the draft and raked it down.

"Isn't it fun?" she asked it confidentially, and counted over the joys pressing upon her: paring the apples on the shady doorstep at eleven o'clock on Tuesday morning; making the crust ('Mira had a knack at pastry and could put into it the joy of an artist); setting the table with dishes that were never used except upon rare festivities; and beyond that, that was the best of all, a hundred happy choices lay before her—a whole long summer afternoon to do with as she would.

The apple dumpling floured, tied and put on to boil, she stood considering. There was the Tuesday corned beef down cellar, she knew, and beets and potatoes. Her father had brought in an armful of green corn. Suddenly her face lit. Once at a girl friend's she had eaten a delicious omelette, and when she came home she had told her mother about it, and her mother declared that omelettes were nothing but froth—if she wanted eggs she could have them boiled or fried. Now, at least, she was going to make her omelette. She would have omelette and spiced peaches and tea biscuits—her father was especially fond of spiced peaches and hot biscuit. She fairly hugged herself with delight. Had there ever, ever, ever been such a Tuesday dinner?

She sped about the kitchen upon happy feet. When the biscuits were made and the table set, she darted into the garden, coming back with a mass of sweet peas which she crowded into a bowl for the center of the table, an exuberance of sweetness and beauty. She made the sauce for the dumplings, opened a jar of peaches, and at last turned to the makings of the omelette. She was sure it would be a success. When it rose, a delicate, puffy, golden brown thing, she looked at it with a smile. She had known that nothing could fail upon her golden day. If only father would like it!

Her father stared at it in a moment's brief bewilderment; then the smile 'Mira loved crept into his eyes.

"Guess you've been trying your hand at suthin' new, 'Mira," he remarked.

"Yes," she nodded, "I have. Try it before it gets cold, father—quick!"

Her father tasted it carefully. 'Mira watched him, too eager to think of her own appetite. Indeed, the day was giving her spiritual food beside which all other seemed coarse and heavy.

"Do you like it, father?" she asked.

"It don't seem like things your mother makes," he answered. "Seems somehow as if there wasn't much to get your teeth into, but it's real tasty, 'Mira." And 'Mira was content. There would be days—oh, years of days—of things one could get one's teeth into!

"I thought you wouldn't want so much with apple dumpling," she said.

Her father looked at her incredulously.

"You haven't made apple dumpling, 'Mira?"

"Yes, I have," she declared, "and it's good, too. Look at that!"

"I dunno," he said whimsically, "how you expect me to go to work after this."

The words gave 'Mira's thoughts the clue. She looked across at him breathlessly.

"Father!" she cried.

Her father waited silently.

"Father, isn't there some place you used to want to go for a holiday? Oh, isn't there?"

This time her father did not hesitate.

"There was Ripton Falls," he said. "It's only 'bout eleven miles, you know, and when your mother and me were first married, I used to calculate we'd run off for a picnic, but we never did; there allus seemed to be things to do. I hadn't thought of it for years. Folks don't talk about Ripton's any more; they go to Green's Falls instead, and I reckon the old road's pretty rough. But I allus calculated mebbe I'd get there some time."

'Mira leaned across to him; her voice fairly sang.

"Do you want to know something I've discovered? We are going to start at three, have supper up there and come home by moonlight—just once. You needn't say anything about work. You can get Tom Dobey to do your milking for once; you've done it for him times enough. You can tell him you have to be away a few hours."

"I don't just know," her father hesitated. But she settled the matter promptly.

"I know, father. If you don't go to the Falls to-day, we'll never get there. We're just going!"

"It don't exactly seem right," he worried; "not on Tuesday afternoon, so—"

"When will you go?" she mocked him. "Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday? Which is your picnic day?"

Her father looked at her, the whimsical wrinkles deepening about his eyes.

"Wal," he yielded.

Now indeed 'Mira found tasks set to hand. The corned beef down cellar, not to be considered for their holiday dinner, was happy provision for sandwiches. There were doughnuts and cookies, and, a sudden inspiration coming to her, she snatched up three or four apples left from the dumplings, and, slicing them hastily, mixed a bit of dough and made four tiny turnovers. A jar of cold tea and the green corn completed that part of her preparations. It remained only to dress to fit her day. She took from the closet a dark gingham, but upon a sudden impulse put it back and drew out a new blue lawn. She might burn it, or tear it, but in the reckless extravagance of her mood, anything seemed endurable except belittling her day. A dainty thing of blue ruffles and sparkling joys, she sat on the porch steps waiting for her father.

He lifted in the basket, but turned to her in surprise as she handed him the corn.

"How did you know I allus calculated to roast corn?" he asked.

But she only smiled wisely. Truth to tell, she could not have said how she knew. Everything seemed breathing secrets to her; it was as if she had tasted the magic dish of the fairy tales and suddenly understood the speech of common things.

They spoke little on the ride. 'Mira sat, her hands quiet in her lap. Out in the fruitful beauty of the September world her joy became a thing too large for words or excitement.

The road was rough, but nowhere dangerous; it would be perfectly safe returning by moonlight, and at once their holiday took the wide liberty of hours unconfined by bounds. As they reached the crest of the long climb, her father drew a deep breath and looked over their world lying warm and sunlit at their feet.

"I allus wanted to see this prospect," he said. "It's sightly, ain't it, 'Mira?" But the question needed no answer; his eyes were following dark tree lines over the green map; suddenly his face lit.

"Look, 'Mira," he said, "there's our house—half a mile south of the red barn. Well, I didn't expect we'd really be able to see it. I used to tell mother we could, but she allus maintained we couldn't, and anyway she said she didn't see the use of climbing a mountain to see her own house. But I sort of wish she could; I sort o' think mebbe she'd like it after all."

'Mira sat silent, her happy gaze gathering its treasure.

Finally her father turned to her. "Shall we go on?" he said. "We must be most to the Falls."

"I hear them now," 'Mira answered.

"There's the big boulder!" her father exclaimed. "Ben Folsom told me about it. And just beyond that—there they are now, 'Mira! Well, so that's Ripton's Falls!"

'Mira gazed at them with a moment's disappointment; they did not compare with Green's Falls, to which she had been upon picnics; but a glance at her father's face filled her with a hushed wonder. Not to her, after all, had fallen the great miracle of the day, but to this gray-haired man beside her. Looking at him, she knew that he saw, not the quiet little falls visible to her eyes, but the glory of a dream fulfilled.

Silently she let him help her out and waited till he tied the horse. Still silently, her loving hand on his arm, she climbed the path till they stood above the brown, tumbling water. Presently he looked around.

"It's pretty, ain't it?" he said. "I was a little mite afraid they wouldn't come up to what I'd expected—things don't sometimes when you've been waiting for 'em for years—but this is better. I dunno's I ever see a prettier fall."

"We might eat supper on the boulder where we can watch them," 'Mira suggested.

"So we could," he agreed. "Mebbe I'd better start the fire to roast the corn now. You wait here, 'Mira. I'll get it."

'Mira sat on a rock, propping her chin on her hands. Presently her father rejoined her. He stepped, she noticed, almost like a young man. He sat down beside her and took off his hat.

"You look like your mother to-day, 'Mira," he said. "I dunno's I ever saw it so plain before. Mebbe it's that blue dress—she had one that color when we was married."

'Mira caught her breath; what strange unknown forces were ruling her day? She had hardly herself understood her impulse to wear the blue gown; now she knew it was that she might keep the festival for her mother. She was no longer 'Mira Spaulding the girl, but 'Mira Spaulding, the bride of those distant years. The girl's young heart swelled with tenderness, with love to her father, with passionate loyalty to the mother who had gone so far along another road that she had lost the way to this. But she should not lose it; husband and daughter would keep her safely in the heart of it.

The corn was roasted presently, and 'Mira set out their supper on the big boulder. Later, they waited by the fading embers of the fire, the small night voices stirring the shadows about them, till the glow of the rising moon was visible in the east.

"When she comes, I reckon we'd better start," her father said, breaking their intimate silence.

"I'm sorry," 'Mira said.

Her father spoke almost solemnly. "I guess I shan't ever forget this, 'Mira, as long as I live."

The drive home through the moonlight was even more than the drive up had been. Only as they turned into the yard her father spoke:

"Tired, 'Mira?"

"A nice tired," Mira confessed.

"You'll have to rest you to-morrow. I shouldn't want your mother to come home and find you tired."

'Mira laughed a little, amused laugh.

"She won't," she promised.

She slept soundly that night, and woke to another day of September beauty, but she looked upon it with unenvious eyes; she had had her day and coveted nothing. After breakfast, Judy Peters brought the quinces; 'Mira put on her irons to heat, and then sat down to peel the fruit. Ironing and preserving in one day was an ambitious task even for her mother, but she knew herself equal to it. Once, upon a sudden thought, she dropped her fruit and ran out to her father.

"Father," she demanded, "O father! Do you mind having Indian pudding for dinner Wednesday? There seems to be one left over, somehow."

He pushed back his hat, smiling down at her.

"I dunno but what 'twill sort o' relish," he said. "Seems as if I hadn't had one for a week o' Sundays."

Back in the kitchen, 'Mira worked with swift sureness. While the quinces were cooking, she "turned off" part of the ironing. Before dinner, twenty glasses of jelly stood on the pantry shelves, and the ironing was half done. By three o'clock the last piece was finished, the fire cooled, and the kitchen in its usual afternoon order. When the stage stopped at the house at four, 'Mira was waiting on the doorstep.

Her mother had climbed down and lifted out her bag before Hiram had more than turned around in his seat.

"You needn't trouble yourself, Hiram," she said briskly. "I'll be in the house 'bout the time you get down. Well, 'Mira, everything all right?"

"All right," 'Mira answered. "Did you have a good time, mother?"

"I dunno what other folks call a good time, but I don't thank anybody to call me away from my own home. Sarah thought her beds were something extra, but I couldn't sleep on the one I had—it was all humps and hollows. I see you made the jelly. There wasn't any need of it, but I s'pose you didn't have anything else to do. Where's your father?"

"He's coming now," 'Mira answered.

Mrs. Spaulding turned quietly and faced her husband. "You're looking better, Ephraim," she said. "I told you all you needed was a few doses of bitters." Her voice was full of the rich content of her regained kingdom. But behind her shoulders 'Mira and her father exchanged a glance of guilty laughter.

Among the Workers

—GOOD NEWS COMES from the Billings Polytechnic Institute at Polytechnic, Mont., announcing that as a result of the special meetings held during the week of prayer "practically all the student body will unite with the church." Four strongly evangelical ministers aided in the campaign, preaching the simple, old-fashioned Gospel. Mr. Ernest T. Eaton, of the staff of the institute, writes: "I can scarcely dare to think what might have been the results of those special meetings if all who wanted to be in the school could have been there."

—GIPSY SMITH, coming from his great evangelistic victories on the Pacific coast, will speak at the mass meeting opening the campaign of the Evangelistic Committee of New York City at Carnegie Hall on April 2.

—MISSIONARY M. ALEXANDER of the American Mission at Montgomery, the Punjab, India, writes us that the photograph on page 10 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 3 should have borne the title of "The Sialkot Convention" instead of the title which appeared. We take pleasure in noting the correction.

—AN INTERESTING LETTER is received from the Rev. Eli Austin, chaplain of the County Poor Farm at Clear Lake, Ia. Mr. Austin came to this country from England years ago under the patronage of Rev. and Mrs. Michael Baxter, publishers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in Great Britain. He received recently a highly prized message from Mrs. Baxter accompanying a welcome consignment of books for use in his present work.

—MRS. CARRIE CROW and Miss Lou Kell, evangelists, have been conducting two campaigns in New York. They were for three weeks at the old John Street Methodist Church, and the closing services of that campaign held on Sunday evening, February 11, saw a remarkable manifestation of the power and popularity of the old-time religion. From John Street they went to the John Wesley Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene, Brooklyn, where they conducted a victorious campaign for a month, closing on March 10.

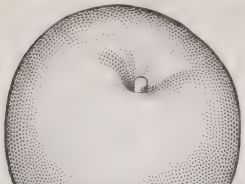
THE PERFECT APPLE



What makes a perfect apple? Pyrox makes a perfect apple by protecting fruit and foliage from codling moth and other leaf eating insects besides acting as a fungicide. It makes the fruit hang on a week or ten days longer in the Fall which gives better color, waxiness and keeping quality, giving that "finish" which brings the top market price. If you like good fruit,—use Pyrox and have it. Wise growers are ordering early. Ask the Bowker Insecticide Co., of Boston, for book on spraying.

OUR COMFORT CORNER

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Wintry Leisure

THE mistress of the farmhouse finds her season of leisure in winter and early spring, when her family is small as compared with what it often is in summer. Then the city cousins visit her, and the farmer has a force of hired helpers for whom provision is amply made at the table three times a day. This is the time when the lady may sit down in the afternoon and read the books and magazines that she laid aside until she could be sure of enjoying them without interruption. This, too, is the convenient season for looking over last summer's frocks and deciding whether the girls can wear them with a little renovation another year. It is the middle daughter who is generally obliged to content herself with hand-me-downs. Daughter number one, having outgrown her wardrobe, is fitted out anew, while daughter number three or number four, being still what her brothers call a kid, must also have something just out of the shop. You see, do you not, that it takes only a few yards to make a pretty frock for a tiny girl, while the eldest sister, shooting up so fast that she will soon be taller than her mother, must be planned for and have first claim on the money that can be spent. The middle daughter, bless her heart, seldom makes a fuss. She is the one who combines the best dispositions of her parents, and there is sure to be among the aunts and cousins somebody to whom it occurs in mid-winter to send a contribution that will look better than anything bought in a shop when it is made over for this Susie or Jenny.

A great deal of pleasure can be crowded into the winter leisure. Those who fancy that there is little going on and that social pleasures are few along the countryside in January and February are greatly mistaken. From Thanksgiving until the beginning of Lent there are all sorts of delightful gatherings. The Grange rallies its membership consisting of both sexes, and the meetings are anticipated with keen enjoyment. They are seldom disappointing. The village church is a center of bright activity, and neighborhood parties for various purposes call together friends who have associations in common and are knitted into close affection by the memories of years.

Winter has a summer glow in its heart for the women on the farm.

The Large Family or the Small

MAY I ask what advantage there is in raising a large family? I notice that many writers of distinction speak with admiration of a family of six children or more. Can the mother of average health and means get six children ready for church on Sunday morning, go herself, and call it a day of rest?"

When there are six children in the home they are not all babies together. The elder children may be so trained that they will help with the younger and do their share in getting themselves ready for church on Sunday, and in helping their mother through the week. Among the photographs that have given me most pleasure is one sent me from the State of Washington, which shows a very beautiful family group. Father and mother are in the prime of life, and their eight boys and girls are sturdy, healthy, fine looking young people, every one of whom has some share in the carrying on of the home. The mother's happiest time, though she does not always know it, is when her babies are not too far apart to enjoy one another, and when at night she may go from one bed to the next, tuck her darlings in, hear them say their prayers and say her own beside them, and give each a good-night kiss. The anxious time for mothers is not when they are little ones to be washed and dressed, made ready for school and church, and carefully trained in the way they should go with tender home discipline and plenty of love. Greater anxiety comes when they reach the reefs and shoals of young manhood and womanhood. The mother who asks the question as to the advantage of the larger family has two sweet children, the elder of whom is five years old. The children are a great delight to her and their father. She does her own work, and being a farmer's wife, her hands are full from morning until night. A hired man, who works on the farm, is a member of the family. This mother does not see how she could care for more than two children without being worn out, tired and nervous. No outsider can determine the right and the wrong, the better and the worse in this question of domestic concern. Parents desire earnestly to bestow upon their children the best available educational advantages. They wish to keep young with their children. Looking over the field of observation there is much to be said on both sides. The balance of testimony seems to be in favor of a larger family than the one most frequently found in an American home. Would it not be well to consider every child a gift from the Lord, and if he sends such a gift, accept it with gratitude?

When a woman, not over strong, does her own work, being much on her feet, receiving no help from the outside, she must be very systematic if she would not become a drudge. It is far less easy for the farmer's wife to secure help in her kitchen and housekeeping than for the farmer to secure a man to help him in the fields. Good husbands, recognizing this, are not averse to putting their shoulders to the wheel and letting their strong muscles relieve weary wives of at least a part of the housework.

For Chinese Women

THE Young Women's Christian Association of this country is carrying on an extensive foreign work. Among recent reports from China we find that one of the American secretaries is planning to prepare and issue a monthly magazine for Chinese women. Much of what will appear in its columns will be written here, sent to the Far East and translated into the language of those who are to read it. Mr. Price Collier has given us a most suggestive and thoughtful book on the West in the East. This particular bit of the West, projected by American Christians for Chinese Christians, this message to be sent monthly to women who are learning how to serve Christ, is in itself interesting and suggestive. What we are to see in China and in other lands that have been under the sway of superstition we cannot begin to estimate. The child who is born to-day in America shall live to see in early manhood a glorious country redeemed from the tyranny of heathendom and advanced to the front rank of world powers. One sings again with new triumph:

> Jesus shall reign where'er the sun
> Doth his successive journeys run;
> His kingdom stretch from shore to shore
> Till moons shall wax and wane no more.

Women in Council

MANY readers have been very much interested in the problem of Bertha B., the daughter of a widowed mother, engaged to be married to a man whom she loves, but who refuses to allow her mother to become a member of his family. The weight of conviction is naturally on the side of the mother, and the selfishness of Bertha's fiancé is reprobated by a majority of the correspondents who have sent opinions to Women in Council. Here are several letters concerning this problem:

Our Comfort Corner

"For a mother to go to live in the home of her married daughter is a very different thing from the coming to that home of the husband's mother. In the first case mother and daughter are accustomed to the same household ways and are entirely in sympathy. In the second case, two women who may have very different ideas and theories are forced into constant companionship all day long. A husband can much more easily conform to the ideas of his mother-in-law than a wife to hers for reasons that are obvious.

"I. H. L."

If we are looking for ideals, a husband and wife are certainly best placed for happiness if they may begin and continue their married life without the presence of even so dear an outsider as the mother of either. Nevertheless, happiness is not the only consideration involved in marriage. Duty comes as the foundation stone before happiness, and the home must be built upon it rather than upon selfishness. To refuse yielding to a manifest duty is extremely selfish. The next letter speaks of the bond between mother and child.

"DEAR BERTHA: Stick to your mother by all means. There is not another friend like her in all the world. No one else has your best interests at heart as she has. If your lover does not care enough for you to let this dearest and best friend enter his home and become a part of it, he does not deserve your trust and self-surrender.

"N. O."

Yet there are mothers and mothers. In common justice this fact must be acknowledged. Some of us have seen the wreck of household peace where a managing, meddlesome or domineering mother of wife or of husband, has forgotten that her married children have grown up, and has proved herself the author of contention. Is there no one to say a word in behalf of Bertha's fiancé? If there is, the question will remain over until another issue.

St. Paul's Whatsoever

IN St. Paul's letter to the Philippians there occur texts that sparkle with the luster of stars, and the oftener we read the beautiful book, the deeper is our thankfulness to God that amid the chances and changes of life we may always turn to the Bible and receive the strength we need. Are we as careful as we should be to guard our thoughts? If we let them dwell on the seamy side of life, on the love that turns to hate, and on the malice and crime of the world as they are set forth in the columns of the daily press, we must inevitably grow depressed. Here is what St. Paul tells us should be our escape from dwelling on the wrongs of life:

"Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things."

A Recipe for a Happy Home

A CORRESPONDENT sends us the following beautiful prayer, which may well be entitled "A Sufficient Safeguard for Domestic Happiness":

"Give us one heart and one way to love, fear and serve Thee forever, and grant us to be like-minded one with another, according to Christ Jesus. Give us always to love, trust and be true to each other and to our neighbor. Save us from being busybodies in other people's affairs, from gossip or taking up a reproach against another. Direct our hearts into Thy love, O God. Amen."

A better work was never published at three times the price

Heretofore the possession of an encyclopedia has been restricted to a very few. The New Winston Cumulative Encyclopedia, as the free hundred-page prospectus shows, is the first to meet the need of that multitude of readers who want exact facts in handy form, yet who do not want to pay exorbitant prices. Not only is the price extraordinarily low (due primarily to our long experience as publishers and to our ability to manufacture in a big way), but is really the best for you, no matter what the price. It is the only encyclopedia which is right up to the minute—it even discusses the causes of the present Chinese Revolution, something no other similar book touches at all.

WINSTON'S Cumulative Encyclopedia

(a new and original work)

Wonderful Cumulative Feature

This is the only truly cumulative encyclopedia. Three recent patents provide the basis for this really wonderful way of keeping the Winston Cumulative Encyclopedia abreast of the times. This new device is handy, not a troublesome loose-leaf affair. Yet the new facts are put where they belong and not in a separate, hard-to-get-at volume all by themselves. This free revision feature does not change the size or appearance of the original volume at any time.

It is the only encyclopedia that is

Compact—Yet Complete

Not only are fully as many subjects covered in the Winston's Cumulative Encyclopedia as in others, but everything is more tersely written in simple language. Every unnecessary word has been cut out, so you may not have to spend a single extra moment in getting all the information you want. There are no technical treatises—just plain, short, simple Anglo-Saxon words.

Winston's Cumulative Encyclopedia (so-called because we bring it up to date each year without expense to you) is an original work from the beginning of A to the end of Z. It is based on the most recent information and statistics—indeed, it is the only encyclopedia using the last census reports in full. Just think of ten volumes, covering nearly 40,000 articles, with over 2,500 illustrations, colored plates and maps, an absolutely new publication in every way, all for $19 to $37, according to binding!

Liberal Payment Terms

to meet at your own convenience. Practically every home can have this library of knowledge—and have it without a bit of sacrifice. Winston's Cumulative Encyclopedia will be sent on approval, without one cent payment, if you wish.

No matter how much you are willing to pay, you can't get anything else as recent, or as complete, or as easily understandable, as this new Winston's Cumulative Encyclopedia. To find out all about the latest Encyclopedia published

Send to-day for your copy of the 100-page Prospectus—FREE.

It is a straightforward sample of what the Encyclopedia really is and it is itself worthy of a place in every library in this country, so useful is it. The prospectus shows the cumulative feature and how it works and contains excerpts from the Encyclopedia illustrating the high class of the work throughout. Compare it with any of the older and unnecessarily high-priced works and see for yourself why it is the best for you.

You owe it to yourself and to your family to know all about this newest wonder in bookmaking. Getting the prospectus does not entail any obligation. Send in the coupon and we will mail it at once. Even if you never thought of getting an Encyclopedia, be sure to get this prospectus and see what this new work really is. It will repay you a hundred-fold for the time you spend in reading it. Write to-day.

You will enjoy reading the prospectus for its own merit; even more will you enjoy knowing about this newest encyclopedia—perhaps the most important work of its kind ever prepared. Your copy is waiting and it is free. Send for it to-day.

Two Kinds of Securities

IN ALL the large cities of the United States, and the same may be said of the cities of all commercial countries, there are certain chartered corporations, known here as Stock Exchanges, in which such securities as stocks and bonds are traded in, just as food products are bought and sold in large quantities in the equally numerous produce exchanges. Recognized institutions, like the New York Stock Exchange, deal only in what are known as "listed securities"; but it would be an error to infer from this that an unlisted security might not be equally desirable. The method of "listing" is about as follows: When the bonds of a well-established corporation, like a strong railroad company, have been so long known to the trade as to establish a reputation for stability, the corporation may and usually does make an application to the exchange to have its bonds listed. The favor being granted, the members are free to buy and sell such bonds on the floor of the exchange, and the prices are authoritatively given in the published reports of all exchange transactions.

The Curb Market

The members of a stock exchange are not permitted to trade within the limits of the exchange, in securities that are not listed. In New York there is what is known as the Consolidated Exchange, in which listed and unlisted securities are dealt in, but the most noted of such institutions is popularly known as "The Curb Market," and it is worth the time of a spare day to visit the Curb on Broad Street, near the corner of Wall, and witness the vociferous crowd of brokers, usually young men who are representatives of nearby firms, selling or buying unlisted securities at the rate, sometimes, of millions of dollars a day. This Curb Exchange, though held by what seems like a rabble in the open street, has its rules and regulations, its established methods of procedure, and its respect for verbal obligations, and it adheres to them as rigidly as do the members of the palatial Stock Exchange across the street.

While the fact of listing a security tends to establish its character for stability, it in no way insures it, nor does the fact that a stock or a bond is unlisted necessarily tell against its desirability, nor mean that it is not largely traded in. The bonds of our largest cities should be and are quite as secure as the bonds of our greatest railroads, yet our search into this form of security discovers that all are in the unlisted class. We discovered also, though we failed to get satisfactory reasons, that certain investors, and particularly certain fiduciary institutions, will not invest in unlisted securities. This is particularly the case with foreign customers, who will not purchase securities that are not listed, believing, no doubt, that the listing in some way insures the safety of the transaction. There is much trading in London, Paris and Berlin in American securities, but in every case the transactions are in stocks and bonds that have been listed in the New York Stock Exchange.

It should be understood that the listing of a bond or a stock does not necessarily make it a more desirable purchase than one unlisted. There are listed securities of which the public knows nothing, and of which even old brokers may know nothing, while there are unlisted securities that daily attract the attention of investors—prudent investors, too. It is estimated that only about 5 per cent. of all bond issues in this country are to be found listed in the New York Stock Exchange.

Why All Are Not Listed

Just here this question naturally comes up: "If it is an advantage to have securities listed, why do not all corporations having sound securities to market avail themselves of this privilege?" This would seem to be the explanation: Buying and selling securities is quite as legitimate a form of business as the buying and selling of grain or meat. It is the thing bought and the character of the seller that influence the buyer in his purchase, nor could the value of the thing be in any way enhanced by the fact that it was listed or in any other way stamped as safe by a corporation dealing in similar articles.

When one wants to buy a lot of supplies for household use he does not drop into the store of an unknown merchant and give his order. If he has not a customary place of trade, he will ascertain, from friends, the character of the most available dealer in his neighborhood, and, relying on the favorable reputation of the man, he will make his purchases, nor care whether the seller belongs to the local Board of Trade or not. So when the unskilled investor wishes to buy a desirable form of security he will seek out the man whose character for good judgment and fair dealing is established, and he will be guided by him, nor ask if the securities are listed or unlisted. Yes, character counts for everything in all human affairs, but in no department of human effort is it so constant, so available an asset as in the legitimate domain of finance.

The success of every business enterprise depends quite as much on the integrity of the managers as it does on the things manufactured or dealt in; if the latter be bad, the customer will not come again, or he may have a suit for false representation; if the managers misrepresent their goods, they will have pulled the props from under their own venture, and it will go down in disgraceful collapse. So, we may be sure, when a great firm, a corporation, or a single individual has made good as a financial trader, the would-be customer may rest assured that personal integrity is, as a rule, the corner-stone of that prosperity. Though the day of the shyster in law, the quack in medicine, the fraud in the pulpit, and the cheater in business, has not gone, it is happily going, for we are fast realizing that, even from a selfish standpoint, "honesty is the best policy." Hence, if in doubt as to an investment, one should no more hesitate about consulting a trained financier than he would hesitate about consulting a reputable lawyer in business troubles, or a skilled doctor in the event of sickness.

Caution vs. Timidity

The near-sighted are always timid in starting over a strange road; but there is a world of difference between wise caution and ignorant fear. It is better not to move than to accept the guidance of an utter stranger, particularly if we have reason to believe that he may benefit by any disaster that may befall us. It is entirely different if there is available the direction of a trained guide whose business it is, and whose interest it is, to keep our feet in the right path.

But, to come back again to the question of listed or unlisted securities, we should add that there is usually some difference as to commissions to be paid the broker, the listed stocks having their commissions fixed, while commissions on the unlisted may be regulated by the seller and buyer, though even with these the rule is growing to have the charges fixed. One advantage of the listed over the unlisted bond is that it is more convertible, that is, it can be more readily turned into cash, which is usually a consideration with the business man who may suddenly have a need for ready money.

Leaving out of consideration the speculative features, though the increased value is not to be lost sight of, a good rule is to confine one's purchases of unlisted bonds to such as are meant to be a permanent investment. If the price advances, well and good, but the main consideration should be the returns from interest or dividends.

Which is the German fatherland?
Where truth attests the grasped hand;
Where joy beams from the sparkling eyes,
And in the heart love warmly lies,
That is the land—
There, brothers, is thy fatherland.

ERNST MORITZ ARNDT.

ONE of the delights of traveling in Germany is the familiarity one soon acquires, or, more properly speaking perhaps, renews, with the familiar folklore and fairy legend of the country. If, in England, one can scarcely escape the Charles Dickens characters, in Germany one is constantly meeting the types immortalized by the brothers Grimm. Indeed it would be quite as difficult to imagine Germany without Mother Hulda, Goldilocks, Red Riding Hood, the Brementown Musicians, Hansel and Gretel, and the rest of the company of dear familiars, as it would be to think of old London without the Pickwickians. German painters, sculptors, musicians, invariably try their talents at portraying their ideals among the children's fairytale folk, and it must be a fine bit of work indeed that passes the muster of German criticism. One of the strongest bonds that holds the German in the characteristic grip of loyalty to the fatherland is this very pronounced love of children and fairy tales.

It is interesting to note, in this connection, that when Herr Engelbert Humperdinck set the matchless story of Hansel and Gretel to music for his own children and made a kind of fairy cantata of it for them to play and sing in the nursery, the news of it got noised abroad and the Germans fairly rose up en masse and demanded that all German children be allowed to hear their beloved story told to music by Herr Humperdinck, with whose musical compositions they already were familiar. So the beautiful fairy cantata made its way out of the playroom of the three little Humperdincks into the world where every one can hear it now! "Hansel," which is our cover subject this week, is almost one's ideal of the thoughtful little babe in the woods who comforted Gretel with berries and gallant little boy songs when they were left alone in the deep woods by the cruel stepmother. Mr. Schaub, the artist, was born in Berlin in 1832. He studied art in Italy, Spain and France and became the favorite pupil of Jules LeFebvre, and is still one of the famous genre painters of Germany.

The Situation in Mexico

THE troubles in Mexico assumed such serious proportions that on March 13 the Senate passed a resolution giving the President authority to prohibit the export of arms and ammunition from the United States into that country or into any American country where "conditions of domestic violence exist." The House of Representatives followed promptly the quick action of the Senate, whereupon the President issued a proclamation prohibiting all such traffic. Rumors arose that ex-President Diaz was backing the present revolution with large sums of money, but it is not considered likely that he is making any effort to reinstate himself at the head of the republic. It was reported that Thomas F. Ryan and the Speyer Brothers had cabled on March 13 to Ernesto Madero, Mexican Minister of Finance, that they would be willing to advance a loan of $10,000,000 gold, or more if desired, to the present administration. This report, however, was subsequently denied by the financiers. There have been persistent rumors that the United States might decide upon armed intervention in the present disturbance, but this necessity will probably be avoided.

SONG

William Watson

APRIL, April,
Laugh thy girlish laughter;
Then, the moment after,
Weep thy girlish tears!
April, that mine ears
Like a lover greetest,
If I tell thee, sweetest,
All my hopes and fears,
April, April,
Laugh thy golden laughter,
But, the moment after,
Weep thy golden tears!

Such Nice Easter Gifts

NOTHING is more popular now at the Exchanges for Woman's Work or on the fancy-work tables in the nicest stores than the charming "doll workbags." One happens upon whole companies of pretty little Quaker ladies made up in soft dove grays with white mull caps, kerchiefs and aprons; or resplendent court ladies of the French Empire in brocades and brilliant silks and satins. I have even met a procession of the quaint fairy-tale people, all on workbag duty. The bags are made with a round pasteboard bottom, to which the bag, which is also the skirt, is sewed in the usual way. Fastened to one side of the top so as not to interfere with the draw string is the China or bisque head of a doll topped off with appropriate bonnet or cap or stylish hat, as the character demands.

Portrait of Mme. Vigee LeBrun and her daughter, from the original painting by Mme. LeBrun.

Candy Boxes

A HOME-MADE box of home-made candy, if both are made with extreme care and daintiness, is a charming "Easter gift." Boxes cut from light cardboard, decorated with a daffodil or an Easter lily and laced together around the edge with baby ribbon of the right shade, are easy to make and charmingly effective. Fill the box with creamy white marshmallows and it would be difficult to find a nicer little Easter remembrance.

The Marshmallows

HOME-MADE marshmallows are much cheaper than those sold by candy-makers, and have this advantage: they are pretty sure to be pure.

Dissolve three ounces of clean, white gum arabic in one cupful of hot water, strain, add one cupful of powdered sugar, and let boil for ten minutes, or until the syrup has the consistency of honey, stirring all the time. Add the stiffly beaten white of one egg, removing from the fire, and mixing thoroughly. Add flavoring to taste; either tincture of marshmallow, rose, vanilla, or orangeflower. Pour the paste into a pan dusted with cornstarch; it should be one inch thick, and when cold, cut into one-inch squares, and roll in powdered sugar. Keep in a tin box to prevent drying too much.

Special Prize Contest

MANY Cozy Corner boys and girls are asking for more puzzles and prize contests. Here is a good one for you all to guess:

My first is my first; it is nothing but one;
Four and three make my second, but I am not done;
Because ten and seven are my one and my two;
Three and four make my three; and I leave it to you
To guess why the half of my four is but three
And my whole a great date in our own history.

Please send answers with a short comment not over one hundred and fifty words by April 10. First prize, $1. Second and third, a best new book. Fourth, ten prizes of interesting postcards. Fifth, twenty entries on the Honor Roll.

THE PROPHETESS

Selected

The brightest hour of unborn Spring
Through the winter wandering,
Bending from heaven in azure mirth,
It kissed the forehead of the earth,
And smiled upon the silent sea,
And bade the frozen streams be free,
And waked to music all their fountains,
And breathed upon the frozen mountains,
And like a prophetess of May
Strewed flowers upon the barren way.

A Good Easter Game

Chicken Market

CHOOSE first a good strong "marketman" and a sturdy, fearless "buyer." The rest of the players are all chickens; they stoop down in a row and clasp their hands under their knees. The buyer then comes to the marketman asking, "Have you any chickens to sell?" "Yes, plenty," says the marketman; "look at them and take your choice." Whereupon the buyer examines the chickens, pretending to be dissatisfied, saying, "This one is tough"; "This one is old"; "That one is too fat," "too lean," etc., etc., until he finds one that suits him. The buyer and the marketman take the satisfactory chicken by the elbows and swing him backward and forward three times, the chicken maintaining its original position. Should it stand the test without laughing or losing its grip on itself, then everything is all right and the buyer leads it off "home." The game continues until all the chickens are sold. Any chicken that smiles or whose arms give way in the swinging test must pay a forfeit, all forfeits being redeemed at the end of the game. If there are more than eight or ten players there should be two or more buyers.

Glad Easter Day*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE little village of Oberammergau, made so famous by the Passion Play, nestles in the valley, surrounded by mountains. On the top of the highest mountain a shining cross has been placed. The cross dominates the village. The first beams of the rising sun touch it, and the last gleams of the setting sun glorify it. It is all the more glorious and shining because there is no figure of Christ upon it.

Jesus himself says: "Behold, I am alive for ever more." So we have a living, loving Saviour. It is this great truth that makes us happy to-day. We love to hear over and over again the story of how Jesus rose from the dead on that first Easter Day. But the story that has such a bright ending had a sad beginning. It begins with that night when Judas came into the Garden of Gethsemane with the soldiers to take Jesus a prisoner to the men who wished to put him to death. Common soldiers

> Crowned our Saviour's brow with thorns,
> They pierced and made it bleed.

And at last Jesus was sent forth to be crucified, bearing his cross; and when it was too heavy for him to bear, they compelled a passerby to carry it, a man named Simon. When they reached Golgotha, there they crucified Jesus. Instead of noonday brightness, there was midnight darkness. When it was evening, the loving friends of Jesus came and took his body down from the cross, and one named Joseph, who had a new tomb, helped them lay the precious body there. As the sad friends of Jesus were leaving the tomb, they passed a glad procession of people who were coming out to gather the "first-fruit of the harvest," which they were to bind in a sheaf and carry to the temple to be offered as a sacrifice to God, after it had been ground into flour and made into bread. The real sheaf, the first-fruits of them that slept, lay in the garden tomb; the sheaf, the first-fruit of the grain, was but a symbol. There was sorrow in one procession, and joy in the other; but neither understood the true meaning of what they were doing. Those who had laid their dead Friend away in the tomb did not remember that he had said: "After three days I will rise again"; and those who went to gather the first-fruits of the harvest did not realize that what they were doing was a picture of Jesus, who should be the first-fruits of the resurrection. Because some did not remember, and because some did not understand, there were no friends to greet Jesus when he rose on the third day, came out of his grave, and went forth into the garden, and then into Galilee. Jesus says to us: "I am he that liveth that was dead; and behold, I am alive for ever more." More than this, he has said: "Because I live, ye shall live also." We call the day of Jesus' resurrection "Easter," and we celebrate it once a year; but as Jesus rose on the first day of the week, we may rejoice and be glad every Sunday, and consider it a little Easter Day. In Carr's Lane Church, London, it is the custom to sing an Easter hymn every Sunday morning.

> Thou art the sun of other days;
> They shine by giving back thy rays;
> Sundays by thee more glorious break;
> An Easter Day in every week.
> KEBLE.

If Easter is such a joyous season now, nearly nineteen hundred years after Jesus rose from the dead, what must it have been during those forty days that Jesus was on earth after his resurrection! His appearances during those forty days were as follows: First, to Mary Magdalene (Mark 16:

* The International Sunday School Lesson for April 7, 1912. The Appearances of the Risen Lord. An Easter Lesson. I. Cor. 15:1-12. GOLDEN TEXT: "This Jesus did God raise up, whereof we all are witnesses." Acts 2:32.

If I could know, feeling that my children would not be a burden to you, I would gladly do so, because the house is too heavy a burden for me. It is impossible to meet the notes on the home and provide a comfortable living for the children.

9); second, to the group of women (Matt. 28: 9); third, to Simon Peter (Luke 24: 33-35, I. Cor. 15: 5); fourth, to the two on the way to Emmaus (Luke 24: 13); fifth, to ten of the apostles (Luke 24: 36-43); sixth, to eleven apostles (John 20: 26-29); seventh, to the fishermen (John 21: 1-14); eighth, to the eleven on a mountain in Galilee (Matt. 28: 16-20); ninth, in Galilee, to over five hundred at once (I. Cor. 15: 6); tenth, to James, probably in Jerusalem; eleventh, on the Mount of Olives, at the time of his ascension (Acts 1: 1-11). Then he was seen no more on earth, but in heaven: by Stephen, at the time of his martyrdom, who saw the heavens opened and Jesus standing on the right hand of God (Acts 7: 55-60). That was the twelfth appearance of Jesus after his resurrection; thirteenth, to the apostle John (Acts 1: 10); fourteenth, to Saul of Tarsus (Acts 9: 1-9).

If we marvel when we read of the newly risen Christ, risen with the same body, so that Thomas might have put his fingers in the wound-prints in his hands and feet and side, we marvel more that in heaven he is still robed in our humanity, still watching over storm-tossed disciples who are never out of his sight, and still the Saviour to give gifts unto men—the Holy Spirit, repentance and remission of sins, as in the case of Saul, "who had made havoc of the church." Still the greatest marvel is that "because he lives, we shall live also." Thus every graveyard becomes a sowed field for a resurrection harvest.

Symbols of the Resurrection

Sleep is a kind of death, and every bed a temporary grave, from which the morning gives us resurrection to renewed activities. A great mystery is this ebb and flow of life if we only stop to ponder it. Even in this very chapter we are studying, the dead are spoken of as "some are fallen asleep" (I. Cor. 15: 6). None of us are afraid to lie down to sleep at night, thinking that we may never wake again; no more should we fear to lie down in our graves, since we have his promise that we shall live again. A seed is a symbol of the resurrection, because the old body of the seed dies and yields a new and more glorious body; compare the small brown acorn and the beautiful oak tree. The resurrection body of Jesus was so ethereal that it passed through closed doors, and was so light that it ascended above the clouds, and as glorious as the sun shining in its strength (Rev. 1: 16). King David prayed: "I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness" (Ps. 17: 15). Let us therefore not be troubled with the questions: "How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" (I. Cor. 15: 35). We rest on the assurance that our bodies will be more beautiful than the earth we have worn about us in this world.

Insect Transformations Symbols of the Resurrection

An old colored woman came into a prayer meeting and rose to speak. Said she, "Don't think you folks know much about this question of the new body. You don't say nothing that comes to the point. Here's a little fellow that knows more than the whole of you." At this she pulled out of her pocket a great locust, and with it his shell or previous skin. The back of the hard skin was split open and empty. "Here," said she, "I saw this beautiful creature with nice wings and splendid eyes, just coming right out of this split in the empty shell. He was hanging tight by his old legs to the bark of a tree while he pulled his new body up out'n de old one. I watched him till I see his head out, and then his body, and then all his legs but one. And then I said, 'You must come with me. You must go to meeting sure. Who you be I do not know, but de Lord

The old body has got a peaked, pinched-up little head, as if it didn't know much; the new body has got a big, broad head. The old body has got great claws and hooks to hold on with, while the new body pulls free. The old body is a plain brown one, the new body is burnished up with green and gold. I jess feels as sure of a second body as could be when I saw this mis'able insect a gettin' his. The Springtime Teaches a Resurrection Lesson

The shrubs and the trees have been leafless all through the winter, but each has a chemical laboratory inside that gets busy at the first warm breath of air, and each bush and tree takes on new life and beauty. In the resurrection of the flowers that are all about us at Easter we have our most familiar symbol. From the dry brown bulbs and dormant roots have come all the wealth of fragrance and beauty that the alchemy of nature has spread around us to-day. The flowers in their beauty bring to our hearts the resurrection story, while each in its form or color has a message of its own. The majestic Annunciation lily almost sings "Hallelujah!" The gold of the daffodils and jonquils is as joyous as the sunshine. The snowdrops and narcissus breathe their purity to the grandeur of the rose and the sweet humility of the violet. We could not do without them at Easter time. We would not if we could!

Bloom now, O Easter lilies! wreathe and twine
Your silver stars around the glad new earth;
The last year's leaf hath died that you may shine,
And there is resurrection in your birth.

The rainbow is a symbol of the resurrection. We look at it stretched across the sky. We have seen it so often, perhaps we have ceased to wonder that it never changes form or colors. And yet the rainbow itself is changing every second or oftener; as often as drops of water fall; so that when we think we are looking at a rainbow, we are looking at a succession of rainbows. The form is always the same, because it is transfigured and glorified by the soul of sunlight. So our human life goes on day by day, reaching out into eternity because God is in us.

Teaching the Lesson to Children

On the Sunday before Easter show the children a wire frame for a wreath, which can be secured from the florist or made by the teacher. Let it be filled with moss. Tell the children that they are each invited to bring a flower to put in it so as to make a crown of flowers on Easter Sunday. By way of contrast, tell them of the crown of thorns which soldiers once made for Jesus, and they will want all the more to make a crown of flowers for him. On Easter Sunday, let the children come one by one to put their flowers in the wire crown, and when they have done this, in simple, loving words let the teacher tell them the Easter story. Add to it the story of the little dead girl whom Jesus raised to life (Mark 5: 22-24, 35-42).

It would be unwise to give symbols of the resurrection to children. Their minds are not developed in that direction, and the truth will only be obscured by their use. For example, if a cocoon and a butterfly should be shown, they would remember only these, and not the riven tomb. As for rabbits and eggs and chicks, or even pictures of them, they should never be brought into the Sunday School at Easter time.

Ivory Soap at House-Cleaning Time

It may seem a little early to clean house. There may be still a chill in the air and the fields are sodden.

But Spring is not far off; and it is none too early to resolve oneself into a Committee on Ways and Means, so that when House-cleaning Time does come, one will know not only what to do, but the best way to do it.

In the first place, let us suggest that you plan your work so as to have a "day off" in the very middle of house-cleaning.

Don't say, "I can't do that." The contrary is true. You can't afford not to do it. What difference does it make whether the parlor curtains are hung on Wednesday or Thursday? But it does make a great deal of difference to your family as well as to yourself if you overtax your muscles, brain and nerves.

Another hint: Begin operations at the top of the house and work down. From attic to cellar is the easiest route.

Now, as to the best way to clean your house and its furnishings: We know it is "born in women" to do this work or have it done satisfactorily. But different women pursue different methods, some better, quicker, easier than others, and all women like to know about new and improved ways.

We, therefore, give below directions which thousands of housekeepers and our own experiments have proven most practical. It is evident that these suggestions mean safe, sure cleaning, for, with Ivory Soap as the chief dirt mover, the work is certain to be well done and without a particle of danger to the article.

We submit our information to the housekeepers of America with best wishes for a more pleasant and more successful house-cleaning than ever before.

The Procter & Gamble Co.

Rugs and Carpets Sweep the rug thoroughly. Then, beginning at the corner farthest from the door, scatter Ivory Soap Paste (see directions below) over not more than a square yard at a time. Scrub vigorously with a stiff scrubbing brush. Scrape off the paste with a metal-edged ruler or piece of zinc. Wipe thoroughly with a cloth wrung out of clean, lukewarm water. Work with —not against—the nap.

Furniture With a painter's brush, 5 or 6 inches wide, apply warm Ivory Soap Paste, covering a small surface at a time. Sponge off, using very little water. Rub dry with a soft cloth.

If furniture is slightly soiled, apply warm Ivory Soap suds with a few drops of kerosene added. Use a soft cloth and rub dry with another soft cloth.

But remember this: Use very little water and don't let it dry on the surface or it will be streaky.

Hardwood Floors If in good condition, treat the same as soiled furniture and polish with a flannel cloth. If they show wear, wash first with Ivory Soap; then apply this finish:

Dissolve 4 oz. Ivory Soap, shaved fine, in enough boiling water to cover it. Beat to a stiff, white foam like whipped cream. Melt separately 1 oz. white wax and 1 oz. yellow wax and stir in briskly, while warm, to prevent hardening. Let it cool. Add one pint of turpentine, a little at a time, beating slowly all the while. Apply with a soft cloth and polish with weighted brush.

Painted Walls and Woodwork Shave a cake of Ivory Soap into a gallon of hot water. Add a pint of milk and 6 tablespoonfuls of kerosene. Have ready a plateful of whiting. Dip a soft flannel cloth into the Ivory Soap suds, squeeze almost dry and apply to the painted wall, or woodwork, a small space at a time.

To remove finger marks, dark spots and stains, dip the cloth first into the suds and then into the whiting. A little rubbing will remove the dirt. Wash with clean, lukewarm water and dry with a soft chamois.

Wall Paper Shave half a cake of Ivory Soap into a quart of hot water. Keep almost, but not quite, at boiling point until the soap is dissolved. Stir in sifted flour slowly, until a thick paste is formed. Let cool. If too thin, or sticky, reheat and stir in more flour. The mixture should be of the consistency of dough. Separate into pieces convenient to handle. Begin at top of wall and work downward in long, parallel strokes.

Windows To a basin of hot Ivory Soap suds, add 2 tablespoonfuls of kerosene. Dip cloth, wring slightly and rub on window. Wipe off with a soft cloth and polish with tissue paper.

The Piano Provide two basins of clean, lukewarm water, to be renewed as often as necessary, and three good-sized pieces of clean cheesecloth.

Wring one cloth nearly dry, from first basin. Rub on Ivory Soap and clean about a square foot of the surface. Wring second cloth nearly dry from second basin and wipe off the suds. Rinse and wring cloth again and wipe off any moisture that remains. Rub dry with third cloth, using quick, light strokes and very little pressure.

When the entire instrument has been cleaned, go over it lightly with a clean, soft handkerchief, or a soft, not new, chamois.

The Piano Keys To a bowl of lukewarm water, add a tablespoonful of alcohol. Wring a soft cloth from this almost dry. Rub cloth on a cake of Ivory Soap. Wipe off keys. Polish at once with a clean, soft cloth.

Oil Paintings
A Famous Artist's Way

Have at hand plenty of clean, warm water (not over 100 degrees), a good-sized, first quality silk sponge and a soft cloth. Wipe off all dirt. Then dip sponge in water, rub on just a little Ivory Soap and go over the painting quickly and gently. Rinse thoroughly and dry with the cloth.

How to Make Ivory Soap Paste Shave one large cake of Ivory Soap into three quarts, or two small cakes into four quarts of water. Do this with a knife, vegetable grater or food chopper. Keep nearly, but not quite, at boiling point for about fifteen minutes, or until the soap is perfectly dissolved. When cool, it will be like jelly. Keep in china or glass jars. Use as needed.

We cannot emphasize too strongly the value of Ivory Soap Paste, not only at house-cleaning time, but also in the kitchen, the laundry and for general household use.

Next Month's Advertisement of Ivory Soap will deal with its uses in the Garden

How Shensi's Martyrs Died

THE FIRST AUTHENTIC STORY OF THE MASSACRE OF MISSIONARIES AND THEIR CHILDREN, RELATED BY E. R. BECKMAN, WHO ESCAPED

SOME time ago THE CHRISTIAN HERALD made mention of the attack on workers of the Scandinavian Alliance Mission in China. At that time, the available information was very brief. We are now enabled, through the kindness of a friend of the missionaries in Barron, Wis., to give to the world the real facts concerning the awful tragedy, which resulted in the death of eight foreigners — missionaries and their children —at the hands of a mob in Sian, the capital of Shensi. It has taken a long time to get particulars about this case, because those who were rescued had to remain at a military school for a period of six weeks, till the authorities deemed it safe to escort them to the coast. During this long interval, the officials prevented any communication regarding the massacre from reaching the outside world.

Sianfu is the capital of Shensi, and is located about a thousand miles from the coast. At this place the mission had erected a preparatory school for the children of missionaries on that field. Some of the parents sent their children a hundred miles by cart to attend this school. At the time of the attack there were six pupils at school, and they were all murdered, together with their beloved "Aunt" Beckman and their faithful teacher, Mr. W. T. Vatne.

The revolutionary movement sprang up very suddenly, so it was impossible for missionaries in the far interior to reach any of the distant ports for better security; and they put confidence in the firm promise of protection by the revolutionary as well as imperial leaders.

In a recent letter to friends in America, Mr. Beckman tells of the tragedy, and his remarkable escape with his youngest child—a girl four years old. While he was conducting a service in the west suburb, on Sunday forenoon, October 22, 1911, soldiers suddenly rushed by into the city to attack the Manchus in the eastern section. On his way home to the south suburb in the afternoon, Mr. Beckman and his native helper were robbed of their horses by revolutionary soldiers. But when the matter was reported to an official, he returned the horses to them, bidding them depart in peace.

"This same Sunday, toward eventide," writes Mr. Beckman, "the natives at our station felt disturbed and wished to leave, when they saw flames of burning houses and heard the tumult of war in the Manchurian quarters. We talked of leaving our station for a place where we could feel more secure. We came to the conclusion that it would be as safe to remain as to flee. Mr. Vatne suggested that he and one of the Chinese would keep watch that night, while the rest of us tried to get some rest.

"About midnight, Mr. Vatne aroused us by a sharp rap on the window. We made haste to get the children ready, and hurried downstairs. The gate to our compound was already set afire, so we rushed to the back yard, hoping to escape over the wall by means of a ladder. I heard gun-firing even from that direction, and I feared we were already surrounded by the mob. The ladder had been removed by our native helpers when they escaped, and in the dark it could not be found. Mr. Vatne and my wife went into the house to take along some things of necessity, while I managed to get a wheelbarrow, a piece of timber and a rope to the wall, which was twelve feet high.

"Mr. Vatne placed himself on the wall, and I began helping the children up. We had got Selma over, and Oscar was on the wall. Just then Selma gave a frightful scream, and Mr. Vatne jumped down to her. I heard two shots and through fright at what they might have done I almost dropped little Ruth. But I placed her on the wall and we called to Mr. Vatne several times. Ruth screamed frightfully, and I took her down. Oscar also came down. I did not dare to put any more of the children over the wall. I got hold of a pickax, and we took refuge in a shed close by, where I began working a hole through the wall; but it had soon to be given up, for the gate was burned down, and the mob entered. We heard them smash the windows of the house. They took what they wanted and set the house afire. The same was done in the schoolroom close by us. We kept as quiet as possible, so as not to draw their attention to where we were. With our youngest child in my arms, I sat praying. The children gathered round me. We gave ourselves over to the will of God. One of the looters entered a little shed close by us, but did not observe us.

"We consulted what to do in case they should find us, which my wife greatly feared would happen. I suggested that we keep close to the sides—that if the door should be opened, they might not observe us, and perhaps would leave. 'If they break the door,' said my wife, 'we must flee for our lives.' We continued praying. It appeared as though we might be left alone, as the mob began to withdraw. But suddenly, with three heavy blows, the door was smashed. Mrs. Beckman rushed out, and the children and I followed. We hurried past the burning houses without encountering any of the mob, but a voice behind us called out, 'Now they run!' When we came to the front gate, I was ahead of the others. When I saw the mob, I hestitated, because, with a four-year-old child in my arms, I could see no way of pressing through the crowd, who, with weapons and torches, were thirsting for our blood. The light from the burning houses and the voices behind made it impossible to turn back. Mrs. Beckman, followed by the children, rushed past me. We all got into the crowd at the same time, and I could no longer see what happened to the others.

"I jumped over a ditch, that if possible I might get to the west side of the mob. Soon I received a heavy blow on the right shoulder. A good many took after me, and knock by knock struck my legs. Noticing that the blows became less frequent, I had hopes of outrunning my pursuers. Finally, I had but one following me, and his knocking did not reach me. I ran past a cross-road, and glanced round to see if I

PROGRESS AT THE BIG CANAL

The Lock Chambers at Pedro Miguel | The Culebra Cut | Building the Famous Gatun Locks

THE stupendous progress that is being made toward the completion of the Panama Canal was brought very forcibly to the attention of the American public by an incident that took place in Germany a few days ago. Colonel Goethals, chief engineering officer in charge, is now on a combination business and vacation trip to Europe, and it was an invitation of Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany to Colonel Goethals which brought the subject of Panama into the public eye again. While in Berlin the American engineer took luncheon with Kaiser Wilhelm, the Kaiserin and Princess Louise. Afterward he told the ever-present reporters that he had found the Kaiser to be a charming host as well as a most delightful companion. Kaiser Wilhelm expressed the keenest friendly interest in the stories of how the great problems which have presented themselves in the construction of the canal have been solved and in the machinery that is being used.

The accompanying pictures give a slight idea of the immense proportions of the work. The length and depth of the great locks are well illustrated by the picture of one of the locks at Pedro Miguel. The Gatun Locks have been, perhaps, the most talked-of section of the canal unless it be the world-famous Culebra Cut. It is here that time after time the engineers have considered the difficulty practically conquered, when down from the sides of the excavation there would come a great avalanche of earth and stone, destroying large sections of their work.

Seemingly unsatisfied with this capacity for worrying the engineers, it has lately seen fit to develop a new one, for according to the latest news item an imitation of a volcano in embryo has been unearthed. The first reports were really quite distressing, but later the geologist of the canal informed the public through some of the great newspapers that as nearly as he could figure the matter out, the appearance of smoke and blue flame was due to a chemical action which was taking place in the newly uncovered bed of lignite. A well-known geologist and mining engineer of New York City has stated that when this mineral is present under conditions similar to those at Panama, oxidation takes place, and there is a consequent rise in the temperature of the mass. This gives rise to a cloud of white smoke. Upon a further increase of temperature, the lighter gases present in the lignite will be driven off and in the end spontaneous combustion takes place, accompanied by light blue vapor or the appearance of a flame.

Most recent reports from the engineering parties on the canal seem encouraging to those who are looking forward to its completion in time for the official celebration in 1915.

HOW SHENSI'S MARTYRS DIED

could detect some safe hiding-place, because I realized that I should drop if I could not soon get some rest. I was now at a low orchard, flooded with water, surrounded by high banks, and I jumped into the water. I noticed that the east side was quite dark, and I crept up near the bank there, where my pursuer could not see me. When others came up, he assured them that the one who got away was a man, that he carried a child, and that he saw him jump into the water. They were hunting for me, but no one dared to come down from the bank into the water. They cursed my ability to run. The other foreigners did not get away, they said; and when I heard this, it was only the fact that I had a child to save that kept me from going back to die with the others.

"Mrs. Beckman and our little Ruth (age seven) and Hulda Bergstrom (age eleven) had fallen near the gate. Hilda Nelson (age fifteen) had reached a short distance westward and tried to escape among the grave mounds near by, where she was struck down. George Ahlstrand (age ten) must have tried to follow me, because his lifeless body was found near the cross-road.

"I prayed the Lord to guide me. My pursuers called to some of the others to bring torches; but I was still too tired to move. Soon the torches were there, and one man called out, 'There he sits,' and he threw his pole at me in such a way that it struck me on the arm and little Thyra on the legs. Then I rose up and walked out into the water. Large pieces of mud struck my head, but caused no injury. Luckily, there were no stones round there. Soon I understood that they could no longer see me, for they began asking each other which way I went. Their own torches blinded their eyes, while my way became light. I could see where to go, could observe their movements, and could hear their speech. They hurried to surround the orchard and put guards at each place where they thought it possible for a person to climb up. Some said 'he went here,' others 'there.' I prayed God to help me up at the north side. I crept down by a tree and sat down in the water, and the cold water made my swollen feet more comfortable.

"All fear was now gone. As soon as I noticed that none were at the north side, I rose and went toward that way. I splashed in the water as I walked along, which they must have heard, because two men came around with their torches. Therefore I had to creep down in the water again while they passed by, keeping myself close to a tree so that they could not see me. As soon as they were back to their starting-place, I rose up. I had prayed for guidance, and the star of hope shone in my heart. After standing a while to let the water run from my clothes, I walked slowly toward the north edge, and gained a foothold on a heap of mud. I could hardly lift Thyra on top of the bank above, and when she was placed there, she began sobbing. Then I had to take her down. I told her if she began crying, those ugly men would come and hit us again; but if she would be quiet, I should soon be on the bank with her. She seemed to understand, and ceased weeping. Having again placed her on the bank, I made an attempt to get up, but only tore down some mud, which rolled into the water.

"How I prayed God to help me! I tried again, and really got up. No one was after me, and I picked up my darling—all I had left on earth—and started off toward the north. I did not look back toward the burning houses—it was sad enough to know that my beloved wife and my darling Ruth lay slain there, together with the other children. I thought of Mr. Vatne and Selma, wondering if they were alive, and where they could be. I continued walking unhindered and arrived at the back gate of the mission station in the west suburb. As soon as I rapped and spoke my name I was let in. The friends here knew something about our dangerous situation, as one of our native helpers had fled here when the mob approached. After answering their eager questions, to the effect that the little girl and myself were probably the only ones who had escaped, tears were shed by my fellow workers and by the Christian Chinese.

"Dry clothes were given us, and the kind friends took charge of Thyra. A place was given us to rest, but I could not rest. I went outside with others, for we feared that even here the mob would come.

"While the excitement still was great, I could bear up under the heartrending sorrow that had befallen me; but toward morning my feelings began to claim their right of way. Sorrow, regret, fear, restlessness—oh, what a change from the calmness and courage I had realized in the midst of the worst of it! Also little Thyra began to weep bitterly. I began praying, and through prayer the child was comforted; but as soon as I stopped praying, she began crying. This led me to continue praying, and anew I yielded myself to the Lord, to live or die, just as he would have it. The friends gathered round, and we had a season of prayer, and had our strength renewed in the presence of the Lord.

"From the military school located just across the road from the mission station, we were informed that we were in great danger, because the mob at the south suburb had decided to come here to the west suburb to continue their violence. No guards were to be had, since the soldiers were all in the city fighting with the Manchus,' who were mercilessly slaughtered. Most of the natives who used to be around us had fled. Three of those who had remained procured muskets from the military school, and acted as guards before our gate. The instructor from the military school invited us to the compounds of his school for better protection.

"After coming here we heard various rumors regarding Mr. Vatne and my daughter Selma. Some reports said they were killed, others that Mr. Vatne was still alive, bound to a tree. The authorities did not permit any of us foreigners to go in search of them, but the native Christians did their best to locate them. We felt an awful anxiety for two days, until we learned that they had been murdered by the mob after having fled eight miles toward the mountains.

"It is said that the revolutionary leader stamped in anger when he heard what had happened to us, saying, 'Are our Chinese people really so foolish that they want to draw the revenge of foreign powers down upon us through such outrageous attacks?'

"Three of the leaders who planned and instigated the attack on us have been punished by death, and their bodies hung up as a warning to others. Some of the officials say more of the culprits will yet be punished, and they try to comfort me as best they can; but there is no comfort save in the Lord and in submission to him."

LANDS THAT ARE YET UNKNOWN

VAST SECTIONS OF THE EARTH THAT STILL AWAIT EXPLORATION

CAPTAIN ROALD AMUNDSEN'S conquest of the South Pole, coming so closely after Peary's great feat in the North, has given rise to the question, "Is there anything more to be done in the field of exploration?" This question is now being asked on all sides, yet there is a very ready answer to it. There is yet much to be achieved. When Peary's victory was announced, there were some who regretted his having discovered the North Pole, as they considered nothing more was left in the field of adventure for other brave spirits. For over four hundred years the Boreal center had been the goal geographers, scientists and explorers had tried to attain.

Peary deserves credit for his feat of almost unparalleled endurance, and the public gives him his due meed of credit, willingly and unstintingly; but what did Peary actually accomplish? Merely the discovery of the Pole. From a utilitarian standpoint it would seem that the results of his achievement will count but little in the future. No new lands were mapped by him, no new discoveries made of territories or islands. His track from Cape Columbia was only about thirty miles broad. Nothing was seen but the expanse of snow and shifting ice.

Now, let us look at the map of the Arctic regions. Following Peary's track we are enabled to fill in on the map, on the open space, a strip thirty miles in width extending from Cape Columbia to the Pole. Practically all of the vast expanse of ocean included between the eightieth and the one hundred and eighth parallels of west longitude and extending from the seventy-second degree of north latitude to the Pole is absolutely unexplored and totally unknown, with the exception of a few islands southwest of Grant Land. Of many lands in the Arctic regions which already have been sighted by explorers, all is yet to be learned. Only the merest parts of most of them have been touched, and almost all have yet to be definitely surveyed.

Among the islands of the Arctic and the Sub-Arctic, there is still much exploration to be done. For instance, Baffin Island, the second largest in the world if Australia is reckoned a continent, has hardly been investigated at all, though lying partly in the North Temperate Zone. Nothing whatever is known of the interior. The Eskimos report that there are two large lakes, but no white man has penetrated so far as to see them; the coast has never been definitely outlined, save from the Gifford River to Cape Hallowell.

In 1850, Captain Collinson of the Franklin Search Expedition sighted land some two degrees south of Point Barrow in Alaska. No man has reported seeing that land since. Many parts of Alaska are still unknown, and had it not been for the gold rush to Yukon, almost the whole of it would still be an unknown territory. Thousands of square miles in northern Canada have never echoed the voice of civilization. Vast tracts of the country lying between Hudson Bay and Alaska are totally unknown and many of the marks on the maps represent only the shrewd guessing of the cartographer. In Labrador only a small amount of pioneer exploration has been accomplished, and much of it is due to Dr. Wilfred Grenfell and Mr. Dillon Wallace. In the northwest there is an arm of the peninsula about 110,000 square miles in area which is an entirely unknown country.

In Antarctica

As to the Antarctic, despite the labors of Borchgrevink, Scott, Van Drygalski, Nordenskjold and Shackleton within the last dozen years or so, the vast region surrounding the South Pole is yet enveloped in mystery. What Amundsen has added to geographical knowledge concerning this region remains to be seen. We have little definite knowledge as to the great space of which the Pole is the center. It has been asumed that Alexander Land, Victoria Land, King Edward VII Land and other lands represent the borders of an Antarctic continent the area of which is approximated at four millions of square miles, or about one-half the area comprised within the Antarctic Circle. Aside from the narrow area lying between 150 and 170 degrees east longitude to the Pole, the track followed by the expeditions, little has been definitely determined.

Outside the Polar regions there are hundreds of thousands of square miles of land surface, not to speak of water, upon which the eyes of the white man have never gazed. Even in Europe are areas of which nothing is known. Tracts in Albania and Montenegro have not been surveyed, and some students of geographical science claim that fully two-thirds of the land surface of Asia have yet to be explored, but this is to be doubted.

A large part of the northern portion of Siberia is absolutely a closed territory to modern investigation, yet its coast line is audaciously traced on the map as if all its configurations had been surveyed. Outside the track of the Trans-Siberian Railroad and the course of a few rivers, much of the country is virtually an unknown stretch of forest and swamp. North of the Arctic Circle, Siberia is a land almost as impenetrable as the wastes of Antarctica. A few of the large rivers emptying into the Arctic have been definitely traced, but that is about all. It will be remembered that it was on the banks of the Lena that the remains of DeLong and his comrades of the Gordon Bennett expedition of 1882 were found.

Asia's Unknown Wastes

A desert, embracing about one-third of Central Asia, has never been penetrated by the explorer. No nomadic tribes, no wandering Tartars, no venturesome Mongols have ever crossed the forbidden wastes of that Gobi desolation, and what lies in the interior is solely a matter of conjecture.

The Chinese hinterland holds secrets which the Mongolian has never been able to lay bare. The ancient hostility of the yellow race to the white man is accountable for lack of knowledge of vast areas of the Celestial kingdom. Inner Mongolia is comparatively speaking a waste on the map of China.

An Outline Map of the World Showing in Black as Nearly as Can Be Defined the Unexplored Portions of the Globe

The great plateau of the Himalayas on the north, stretching into Chinese Turkestan and Tibet, has baffled scientific investigation. Chinese Turkestan, sometimes called Chinese Tartary, has defied both the daring and the cunning of the traveler. Few of the outside world have entered it, and no one has yet been able to tell definitely either its extent or the number and nature of its inhabitants. The open spaces on the map indicate the great plains which have not yet been explored. Here the source of the mighty river Brahmaputra has never been traced.

Tibet until recently has been the mystery of the world, and even now almost the whole of the interior is sealed to the white adventurer. The Dalai Lama, the Buddhist Pope, has guarded its secrets well. This Oriental potentate has his headquarters at Lhasa, "the forbidden city," a walled stronghold, the Mecca of Buddhism. Younghusband, Landor and Sven Hedin are about the only white men who have gone into this unknown land and returned to tell any kind of a tale concerning it.

In Burma, the rise of the river Irrawaddi has not been determined. Of the interior of Siam we know nothing, and the same may be said of the jungle-country of Malaysia.

Coming to the southwest of the continent, we find large tracts on the map wholly undetermined. A great deal of Persia, as well as much of Afghanistan and Baluchistan, are yet to be opened up by the explorer. But of all the countries of Asia, strange to say, Arabia, so rich in historic memories of the early time, is now the least known. It is more of a mystery than Tibet. Almost the entire southern half, according to native report, is a vast wilderness called Ruba el-Khali, or "Dwelling of the Void." There is scarcely a trace to indicate that any part of it is within the sphere of modern knowledge.

A great deal has been determined about Africa within recent years, but there is much yet to learn. For every explorer of half a century or so ago there are a score now, but withal the Dark Continent still holds many secrets.

We shall not take into consideration the Sahara, largest desert in the world. In the country adjacent, throughout the Soudan region, and in the Belgian and French Congo are thousands of square miles wholly unknown. Even in British and German East Africa much is to be done. Several of the coast countries have only been penetrated a few miles inland. This may be said of the Gold Coast and the Ivory Coast. There is scarcely a dot on the map of Italian Somaliland on the east of the continent to show a traveler's trail, while on the west is Liberia, in which Americans take much interest, with the greater part of its surface unknown.

On the farther side of Egypt lies the great Libyan Desert, a region which, from the remotest times, has repelled the traveler. Only attempts have been made at defining the boundaries of its desolation. In truth, the vast territory of sand and slate and salt and rock stretching from the Atlantic through the Sahara, the Libyan Desert, Nubia and thence into Arabia, is still as solitary and remote as in the times when Abraham set forth from Babylon.

In South Africa, had it not been for the frequent wars, the discovery of the diamond fields, and the consequent interest and attention centered on the countries there, much would still be involved in darkness. As it is, there are tracts in German Southwest Africa and Bechuanaland, as well as in Rhodesia, which have not as yet been investigated.

The Unknown in South America

There is not a country of the large continent of South America fully explored. Here there is a wide virgin field for the cartographer. Colombia, a state teeming in rich minerals—platinum and gold—has more than 200,000 square miles of area which the white man has never penetrated. There are 40,000 square miles of Ecuador, one of the smallest countries of the continent, yet unexplored. In Bolivia there are 275,000 square miles of llanos and plains as unknown as in the days of the Incas.

Lying within the basin of the head waters of the Amazon in western Brazil are three regions much larger in area than all the New England States which are still outside the pale of our knowledge. This large territory lies between the parallels of 10 degrees south latitude and 5 degrees north latitude and the meridians of 60 degrees and 73 degrees west longitude. Not a country of South America has been accurately defined and fully explored. The great difficulties with which the scientist must contend in mapping this continent in the equatorial regions account for the large areas still uncharted. It is the hardest section in the world to penetrate. Dense forests, a deadly climate inducing the worst scourges of disease, as yellow fever, cholera, beriberi, etc., the fierce wild beasts, poisonous serpents and savage tribes are some of the obstacles to be encountered in penetrating the Amazon country.

The entire central portion of Australia is an unknown tract save for a direct line in which the transcontinental telegraph system has been laid. The greatest difficulty was encountered in stretching the wires across the desert waste and the small strip thus opened up is all that is known of the heart of the island continent. It is supposed to be a vast sandy plain, interspersed here and there with salt lakes to vary the horrible monotony. Hundreds of daring men have tried to penetrate its mysteries and most of them have paid for their temerity with their lives. Then there is the "Never-Never" land in Western Queensland, into which many have gone and few have returned. In the south of the country, extending for hundreds of miles inland from the great Australian Bight, is a terra incognita, the extent and nature of which can only be surmised.

In the large island of New Guinea is an unknown area greater than the whole of New England. From New Guinea to New Caledonia there are many large islands yet to be traveled by the white man.

It is evident that there is much yet to be done in the way of exploration. The discovery of the poles hasn't solved all the problems of geographical science. Many others remain just as difficult and infinitely more important—enough to keep the explorers going for many a day and year to come.

THE EASTER SUN

TEXT: "And very early in the morning they came unto the sepulcher at the rising of the sun." Mark 16: 2

IT WAS a doleful night in the Vale of Weeping. The disciples had hoped all along that Christ would restore the glory to Israel; but, alas, he was dead! He was lying in a rock-hewn sepulcher with his hands folded over his breast. The eyes that had looked on suffering with divine compassion were closed. The gracious lips that had spoken as never man spake were dumb. The feet that had gone about on errands of mercy were wrapped in red-stained cere-cloth. Great Heart was dead!

The silence of the night without the sepulcher was broken only by the footfall of sentinels pacing to and fro. On a sudden the earth began to tremble; a great light shone from heaven and the soldiers fell as dead men. A troop of angels appeared and rolled the stone away; and he came forth, wiping the death dew from his brow.

The Resurrection Dawn

Now, look yonder! Over the heights of Bethshemesh there is a glimmering of dawn; a golden mist is rising from the Mediterranean; and behold, the sun "flames in the forehead of the morning sky." Oh, glorious sun! In the light of that morning the world has been growing brighter all along the succeeding ages. In its light the children of sorrow have caught the glow of a blessed hereafter and conceived a "hope that maketh not ashamed." In its light we find the solution of every problem that has to do with everlasting life.

> How calm and beautiful the morn
> That gilds the sacred tomb,
> Where Christ the crucified was borne
> And veiled in midnight gloom!
> The gates of death were closed in vain;
> The Lord is risen; he lives again!

The light of that morning shines with revealing power on the Manger of Bethlehem. The Child there wrapped in swaddling bands was he of whom it had been written, "A virgin shall conceive and bear a Son and shall call his name Emmanuel, which being interpreted is God with us." Is it a mystery? Yes, surely. "Great is the mystery of godliness; God manifest in flesh; the angels desire to look into it." No mortal mind can explain how Godhood and manhood are interwoven, as warp and woof, in the person of this only-begotten Son. However, the world is full of inexplicable mysteries which are nevertheless indisputable facts. But is the Incarnation such a fact? Was Jesus of Nazareth what he claimed to be? "I adjure thee, by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ or not!" So demanded the high priest, and his challenge finds an echo in the experience of all thoughtful men. "Show us a sign," cried the rabbis; and the heart of the world responds, "Show us a sign, whether thou be the Christ or not." His answer is forthcoming: "There shall no sign be given you but the sign of the prophet Jonas; for as he was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." So be it. We will take him at his word. He proposes to vanquish death and thus vindicate his claim.

"O Death, Where Is Thy Sting?"

Death has the right of way. Always? Nay, not in Joseph's garden. Here Christ meets Death and vanquishes him. In the darkness of the sepulcher he fights his battle single-handed and comes forth crying, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

The sign is fulfilled. Jonas is delivered from the belly of hell! Thus does Jesus of Nazareth vindicate his right to the name "Emmanuel," which was written on his swaddling bands. For by his resurrection he hath shown himself with power to be the veritable Son of God.

The light of the Easter sun rests also on the tragedy of the Cross. On its transverse beam is inscribed "Jesus." The claim of redemption is in that word. For it was written, "They shall call his name Jesus, because he shall save his people from their sins." No other of the children of men has ever put forth such a stupendous claim. He said of himself: "The Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sin." The reason why he could forgive sin was because he "bare our sins in his own body on the tree." But how shall we know that his death had such saving value in the sight of God?

It all depends on the miracle of his resurrection. Show us the sign! "For if Christ be not risen then is our preaching vain; and your faith also is vain; ye are yet in your sins." He affirms that he is able to save unto the uttermost all that will believe in him. Let him prove it!

How did the Philistines learn that Samson was the unconquerable champion of Israel? They shut him up within the gates of Gaza; they fastened the bolts and compassed him about with guards; and lo, he "arose at midnight and took the two gates and the posts thereof and carried them up to the hill of Hebron." At the break of day the Philistines saw him yonder, leaning on their gates and bars and laughing at their discomfiture. So do we learn the redeeming power of God's only-begotten Son. His soul could not be kept within the gates of Sheol. He came forth with the keys at his girdle. Thus the Yea and Amen of God was put upon his power to save. And now, I know! "I know whom I have believed; and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day!"

The Illuminated Book

The light of the Easter morning falls also upon the Bible as the Word of God. It is the one Book of all the sacred books of the world that has to do with everlasting life. It treats man not as an ephemera living for a handbreadth of time, but as a child of God, made in his likeness and after his image, and destined to live forever. It treats death not as a fatal accident but as merely an incident in life. Does death end all? Not in the philosophy of this Book. Death ends nothing; it begins all. Life here is merely the vestibule in which we robe ourselves for the life farther on.

And this Book of the Endless Life is also the biography of the Lord of Life. He walks through its pages like a king through the corridors of his palace, from its opening prophecy of the Seed of Woman to its last vision of the Sun of Righteousness arising with healing in his wings. And always he walks as the Lord of Life.

So when by his resurrection he vindicates his authority as the Incarnate Word of God he, by the same token, vindicates the authority of the written Word. The Bible and his resurrection go hand in hand. Find me a man who disbelieves this Book and I will show you one who lifts his eyebrows at the resurrection of Christ. In these days of Biblical controversy, when all sorts of arguments are presented pro and contra, let this fact be deeply emphasized; that, when all is said and done, the ultimate and incontrovertible argument for the truth of Scripture is in the resurrection of Christ as the Incarnate Word and therefore the living complement of the Written Word of God.

The light of Easter is thrown also upon the church. The church is founded upon the proposition, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." If that can be demonstrated, the church with its propaganda has a reason for life. Otherwise it has none. For if Christ be not risen our preaching is vain.

> Heavy fall the shadows on the dim horizon:
> Veiled the starry eyes from wistful eyes below;
> Cold and still thou liest in thine earthly prison;
> Whither, Lord and Master, whither shall we go?

It is not surprising that Peter and his fellow disciples lost heart after the crucifixion. He said, "I go a fishing," and they said, "We also go with thee." Why not? Why should they continue their itineraries among the villages of Galilee preaching the saving power of the Gospel of Christ if he himself had gone the way of all flesh? Their occupation was truly at an end; and there was nothing left but to return to their boats and nets. But when they met Christ face to face and knew that he who had been dead was living and alive forevermore, they were straightway baptized with power and enthusiasm and went everywhere preaching the Gospel, because there was substantial ground for it.

Nor is it surprising that Paul, as inquisitor of the Sanhedrin, went up and down breathing slaughter against the followers of Christ. Why not? He "verily thought that he was doing God's service"; for, to his mind, the death of Christ had proven the falsity of his claim; so that his Gospel was a manifest imposture. Was ever a man so taken aback as he when he met the living Christ on that journey down to Damascus? Right about face, now! There was no alternative for the conscientious man. He saw that the Saviourship of Jesus had been verified by his triumph over death. What could he do thenceforth but go everywhere proclaiming, "This Jesus is the Christ."

And this is the commission of the church. "Wo is me if I preach not the Gospel!" The Gospel is true; and the obligation of Truth is upon every man and woman in this world of ours. Wherefore go tell all people that Christ is risen from the dead and that he hath power on earth to forgive sin.

"Rabboni!"—"My Master!"

The light of the Easter morning falls thus on all the pathway of the Christian life. The promise of Christ is, "Lo, I am with you alway. I will not leave you comfortless; I will come to you." What does that mean?

In some quarters there is an effort to explain it away as a reference to his influential presence. We hear much also of the "immanence" of Christ. I do not like the word "immanence" in this connection. It has a cold, mechanical sound. It suggests the enveloping atmosphere, which presses upon us always with a power of fifteen pounds to the square inch or thereabouts. This is not the meaning of Christ in the promise referred to; he said precisely what he meant, namely, that he would be personally with us. And he is thus with us as our friend and counselor and guide. He links arms with us, as it were, and walks beside us in all our journey through the Valley of Tears, through the Valley of the Shadow of Death, through the gates into the heavenly city.

So it appears that all that makes life worth living is emphasized and glorified in the sunrise of Easter Day. If Christ be not risen, we are bereaved indeed! "If in this life only we have hope in Christ Jesus we are of all men most miserable."

The soul of Mary of Magdala was cast down within her while Jesus lay in his sepulcher. He had been her dearest friend. He had lent a helping hand to lift her from the deepest mire. And he was dead! It was as if the light of her eyes had gone out. Thus she lingered at the empty grave when the other women had gone their way. Hearing a footstep behind her she turned and, seeing with her tear-dimmed eyes a man whom she supposed to be the gardener, she cried, "O sir, if thou hast taken him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him." He spoke—a word only, a word whereat the currents of her life went surging hot and fast: "Mary!" Hope, happiness, heaven, all sprang to life again; and falling at his feet she cried, "Rabboni!"—that is to say, "My master!" Thus the hope of the resurrection morning translates itself at once into happiness and usefulness. Our profession of faith can find no deeper or higher expression than this: "My Master!"

Shine, O Easter Sun!

God help us to keep our windows open toward the Easter dawn. Break, O morning of the Resurrection, upon our souls, too often overwhelmed by sordid doubts and fears! Shine upon the universal church that it may go forth conquering and to conquer in the name of the risen Christ. Shine into the trysting places where we make our feeble prayers, and give us faith to realize that he ever liveth to make intercession for us! Shine into our night of sorrow, that, looking from the darkness of an open grave to the glory of an open heaven, we may praise him in whom life and immortality are brought to light! Blessed be God for the daybreak of the resurrection. Oh, glorious sun!

HIS MATCHLESS WORTH

THIS day our Saviour we exalt
Above all other men.
He lived our life without a fault,
He triumphed over sin.
Among the lowly ones of earth
The Saviour showed his matchless worth.

Bound down by sin, no hope had we
To share the joys of heaven.
The Saviour came and set us free;
Through him we are forgiven.
He bore the cross that we might live;
Eternal life was his to give.

Forth from the grave the Saviour rose,
The battle fought and won!
Triumphant over all his foes,
God's well-beloved Son!
Exalt the name of Jesus now;
The victor's crown adorns his brow.

This Easter morn—this day of days,
His triumph we recall.
Let us with angels sing his praise
And own him Lord of all.
The Son of God now reigns above;
Oh, who can slight his wondrous love?

Open my heart and you will see
Graved inside of it, Italy.
ROBERT BROWNING.

ALL people agree, in every language of the world, in calling Naples "the beautiful." Set on the ancient weather-beaten hills that rise out of her noble bay on the shores of the midland sea, Naples rises in beauty supreme over all other cities of southern Europe. Nor is Naples unique in transcendent beauty alone; in one other characteristic she is supreme; and this is noise. La Bella Napoli is never quiet, never asleep. Morning, noon, night, midnight, dawn, full break of day, the weary traveler has waited in vain for the noise to abate. This is the ordinary state of affairs, while on market day the din is nothing short of wonderful. Truly, the cheerfulest sight in Naples is the Neapolitans. One may weary of her noises, but her street life is of unfailing interest. Neapolitans of all classes literally live out of doors. Gay and fine of spirit, taking little thought of the morrow, they are perfect examples of the happiness that may be found in sunshine. Even the very poor in Naples are not in the least melancholy, while the tradespeople and working class are the most persistently happy people in the world. There is a delightfully characteristic Neapolitan market-day song, the refrain of which is:

Market day, market day, if I have sold nothing this market day,
I will come again next market day and sell you fruit from my garden.

Our cover subject is a typical early morning market scene at the Porta Capuana in old Naples. For charm of subject, color and winsomeness there are few genre pictures of the early nineteenth century comparable to it. Vincenzo Migliaro, the painter of the picture, is an artist of rare distinction who, still living among his beloved Neapolitans, declares, when asked the secret of his phenomenal success in portraying Italian life, "I have but to set my easel anywhere and paint what I see." Vincenzo Migliaro, for spiritual power and the portrayal of typical Italian life along the street ways, ranks among the first best painters of his time.

Men and Miracles

By Eugene Thwing

GIVE us water that we may drink!" cried the people, angrily, to Moses at Rephidim. There was no water to give them, and they knew it. But Moses had stretched out his rod over the sea and it had parted for them; he had cast branches of a tree into the bitter waters of Marah, and they were made sweet; he had told God of their hunger, and bread was rained from heaven. Moses represented to them a miracle-working power. They had grown accustomed to miracles from the time Moses first arrived at Pharaoh's court on his errand of liberation. Now they were thirsty and there was no water. Immediately they demanded another miracle and got it when, at God's command, Moses smote the rock and the water gushed out. Poor, weak, helpless slaves! How much they needed the forty years' hard life in the wilderness!

We are just like them. We are constantly beseeching the Almighty for miracles to supply our wants, to win our battles, to offset our mistakes. We set our hearts on some particular thing for our church, or our business, or our home. We have seen the wonders of God's generous and merciful providence in the past, and we expect them to be ready to our order again, forgetting that we may be mistaken in our plans, and forgetting that we should be fighting our own battles, with courage and faith in our hearts.

THE man who is alive and awake to-day, who has caught the right sense of his relation to the forces of nature and the forces of the soul, who studies his possibilities instead of brooding over his limitations, who has in him the God-given spirit of ruler and conqueror—this man is not spending much time crying to heaven for miracles.

He realizes that he is, himself, in his wonderful faculties of soul and body and in the splendid reach of his growing powers, God's greatest miracle, and that he is commanded and expected to be the agent of his Creator in the performance of his own miracles of achievement.

Moses struck the rock at God's command and the water gushed out. The people were primitive and helpless, and needed miraculous supply. There were no post-graduates in the school of human miracle-workers then. Modern man would have distilled sea-water, or dynamited the clouds, or drilled the earth a thousand feet or more.

To-day, the miraculous achievements of conquering man on the earth, in the air and in the water are crowding one another so rapidly that the mind cannot grasp them all, and the pulse refuses to throb with excitement when some new marvel is chronicled. But we need not be greatly concerned with these more conspicuous examples of man's mastery over the physical forces of nature. It is more to the point to remember that the truth of mastery applies in the lesser and more individual affairs of our daily life. If that were not so there would be little real use or inspiration and comfort in it for most of us. We are constantly finding ourselves in need of the strength to prevail in our business or in the domestic routine. So tired and discouraged do we become at times that it seems as if nothing short of a miracle will set things right. Just then, of all times, do we need a clear vision, a strong faith in God, and an unyielding persistency supported by determination and full confidence in the possibilities of our own dominant ego.

A YOUNG man had been holding down a five-dollar-a-week job in one of the big insurance companies for several years. It was getting to be a habit. Men higher up dropped out, but their places were always filled by friends of those still higher up. The "line" did not seem to move. The young man began to feel that he was doomed to a narrow, profitless life. He could see nothing ahead for him. One day he discovered that he wanted to get married. Five dollars a week! What mockery! Nothing short of a miracle could connect him with an income sufficient to support a wife.

He appealed to a friend to perform such a miracle, or to direct him to some worker of wonders in his behalf. The friend complied at once by putting the young man face to face with himself. "If you will come to me as a stenographer and typewriter, I'll start you in a place here," he told him.

Well, of course that was impossible, replied the young man, because he didn't know the first thing about either stenography or typewriting. Then the friend treated him to some very plain talk about the possibilities within the grasp of the young man who wills. He succeeded in rousing the spirit of the conqueror in him. About two months later the young man had qualified for the new position, and soon thereafter he was winning prizes offered for expert work. This was only a beginning. Before long he had multiplied his income eight times and was supporting a charming family of his own.

SUPERHUMAN miracles are not made to order by the Almighty to please the whims or to counteract the blunders of man. At critical moments, when God sends us some great emergency outside of ourselves and beyond all our power to master, he will provide a suitable miracle to take care of the situation he has created. In the regular affairs of daily life he expects us to meet our own problems and difficulties manfully, courageously and victoriously with the strength he supplies in response to our petitions. We can safely trust him to take care of any situation which he creates, but we must not shirk our part and expect him to make up for our deficiency by his miraculous power. It is up to us to pray in faith and then to go to the utmost limit of our power to secure the answer to our own prayer. God's part begins at the point where our power ends. We must not be too hasty in thinking we have reached that point. As long as we have another moment of time and another ounce of power we can keep on trying. God knows when it is time for him to begin. Perhaps when we are feeling the extremest need, his power is ready and waiting for us, to use if we will only make the connection by faith.

THE CROSS OF GOLD

NOW light has oped the gates of morn
And crossed the far horizon bar;
While to the world new day is born,
The east glows as a single star.

Uplifted o'er cathedral tower
Against the azure skies, behold—
Emblem of centered love and power—
In glory gleams the Cross of Gold!

I gaze: and I am in control
Of Hope that sees and Faith that knows;
Across the highlands of my soul
A wind of exaltation blows.

When faint of heart I see the Light
'Tis not as Thou wouldst have me see;
Then, Lord, I cannot hear aright
The word thou sendest here to me.

When I am wearied on my way,
My heart filled with weak murmurings,
And fearful of too long delay,
Thou, pitying Lord, wilt lend me wings.

I in thy promise will abide,
That keeps my soul with hope elate,
That joys to-day to me denied
Are brightening for me while I wait.

With mind serene, all fear above,
Again I upward gaze: behold—
Emblem of centered power and love—
In glory gleams the Cross of Gold!

Canton's Great Revival

CANTON, Ohio, has lately been the scene of an enthusiastic revival, led by Evangelist W. A. Sunday. He conducted wonderful meetings at Youngstown, Toledo, and Springfield, but the scenes at Canton were the most remarkable of all. Mr. Sunday labored for five weeks, speaking to large crowds but getting no convictions. Suddenly, as in the case of the Welsh revival, people became conscious of a mysterious influence which caused everybody to become anxious about their souls. Rich and poor—the mayor, bankers, lawyers and merchants—all came under the spell, and before Mr. Sunday closed, five weeks ago, there were about six thousand converts. The revival, in some of the churches, is still at white heat. Rev. Charles Recard, pastor of the United Brethren Church, who has held meetings continuously for the past month, has alone received no less than 850 new converts. At this church everybody seemed to be seized with the spirit of prayer, several being on their knees praying at once. The young men of the church formed an evangelistic band and went about the streets in groups doing personal work.

Mr. Sunday opened a revival meeting in Wheeling, W. Va., several weeks ago. The second week 750 Canton people from the various churches journeyed over and were met by a band at Wheeling station. Mr. and Mrs. Sunday headed the procession through the Wheeling streets amid lively scenes. Eighty new Bible classes have been formed at Wheeling. Every moment of the day Evangelist Sunday is planning work for his associates in factories and shops, and one cannot but admire the extraordinary self-sacrifice of the man from a physical point of view. At the invitation of the city officials of Canton, on McKinley Memorial Day he addressed an audience of 5,000 persons. A. SHELDRICK.

A SPRING SONG

UNSEEN an angel band,
A hundred thousand strong,
Passed singing through the land
And left an echoing song.

All clad in robes of flame
They passed the woodlands by,
And maples where they came
Now lift their torches high.

And now the woodlands thrill
With music tense and strange,
And to each vale and hill
Has come a wondrous change.

Athrill with waking life,
The birds and brooklets sing;
And, leaving wordly strife,
Our glad souls greet the Spring.

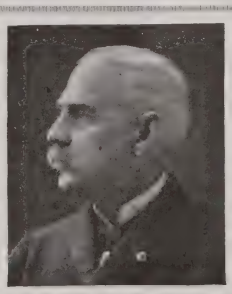
In the Footsteps of St. Paul

WHERE PAUL FULFILLED HIS VOW—BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

The Church of God Which Is (Now) in Cenchreæ



Brush-laden Donkeys on the Road to Cenchreæ

SOME nine miles to the east of ancient Corinth was its seaport on the Ægean Sea, the then busy city of Cenchreæ. Now, though almost every vestige of the ancient city has disappeared, yet fortunately we know its site, and it is still possible to visit the shore, now silent and deserted, where the grain ships of Alexandria and Antioch, or the smaller coasting vessels from Ephesus and Thessalonica once made it one of the busiest marts of the world. Even the name has been preserved in a corrupted Greek form, as Kichries, and it can be reached from modern Corinth in about two hours' time.

In following the footsteps of St. Paul, I undertook this seldom-made journey, and was rewarded by discovering one of the most charming scenes of mountain and valley, bay and islands, that my eyes ever rested on. Many travelers visit Corinth every season. They climb the plateau to old Corinth; they view the ancient ruins lately unearthed; they climb to the top of Acro-Corinth perhaps, and see the marvelous view from this mountain citadel; and then, returning to the modern village, take the first possible train for Athens or Patras. Not one in a hundred, perhaps not one in a thousand, ever thinks of going to Cenchreæ.

The landlord of your hotel will tell you that there is nothing there to see, and that the roads are almost impassable. Even Baedeker thinks it worthy of very scant notice, and devotes less than two lines, and that in the finest print, simply mentioning that there is such a place. Its present-day obscurity and remoteness rather enhanced my desire to visit it; and when the day was over I was exceedingly glad that neither Baedeker nor the landlord had discouraged me.

As is well known, Corinth had two ports, one at Lechæon on the Gulf of Corinth, connecting her with Italy and Dalmatia and the West, the other at Cenchreæ on the Ægean Sea, giving her access to the trade of Asia and Africa. Such a unique position was enjoyed by no other city in the world, though the modern Port Said in the Old World, commanding the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, and the cities of Panama and Colon in the New World, commanding, by means of the great canal, both the Atlantic and the Pacific, have a similar situation.

But both Port Said and Panama are sectional and provincial cities as compared with Corinth in her palmy days, for all the commerce of the ancients centered in the Mediterranean, the Ægean and the Adriatic. There were for them no other seas, and Corinth controlled them all. She sent her ships to every port, and laid every land under commercial tribute to her strategic position. Thus Cenchreæ, one of her two great ports, was a place of no little importance, not only to Corinth but to all the trading world.

It was a bright day in early December that we started from New Corinth to visit the site of the city where Paul, some 1,850 years ago, fulfilled his vow, and had his hair shorn, which, because of that vow, he had for some months allowed to grow long. We do not know the occasion or purpose of this vow, but it was a common practice among the Jews, as a sign of gratitude for some special mercy or deliverance, to take a vow like that of the Nazarites: to drink no wine, to abstain from certain legal pollutions, and to allow the hair to grow until the time had expired.

It was a matter of deep religious significance to the vow-maker, and often a private matter between himself and his God. At any rate, on this occasion Paul does not deem it necessary to explain why he made the vow, and we need not inquire too curiously.

A Greek Shepherd and His Flock

Some have considered it very strange that Paul, a Christian and the head of a Christian church made up of both Jews and Gentiles, should adopt this peculiarly Jewish custom. But Paul was still a Jew, though a Christian Jew; and a ceremony that had a deep spiritual meaning to his own soul he may well have continued, even though it were characteristic of the Jews who had become his enemies.

But to return to modern Cenchreæ and our journey thither. The carriage and span that we engaged for the trip were more useful than ornamental, and the driver was apparently deaf and dumb, for he only communicated with us by signs. But the carriage was strong, the horses careful, and the driver skilful; all of which traits on the wretched roads which we had to traverse were more important than beauty and loquacity.

Our way takes us through the chief business street of modern Corinth; across the little park of pepper and pine trees; past a noisy school of vociferous children, who seem to "study out loud," as they do in China; across the railway and past the barracks where soldiers in frilled fustanellas and enormous slippers turned up at the toe, according to the Greek style, are loafing; past the street vendors of pumpkin seeds and pistachio nuts and sticks of candy of violent colors (vendors who wisely congregate near the schoolhouse and the barracks); until at last we are in the open country, where the sights change not from age to age.

Acro-Corinth, stern, imposing, majestic, a natural fortress of solid granite, looms on our right, now, as in Paul's time, the most striking feature of the landscape. Behind us, to the west, is the beautiful gulf, whose lines we can trace to its easternmost shore, where the new canal cuts through the solid rock and connects its waters with those of the Ægean. Beyond it rise the mountains of Attica, the lights and shades chasing each other across them as the fleecy clouds now obscure and now reveal the morning sun. Before us are other mighty hills, "rock-ribbed and ancient as the sun," which dip their feet in the waters of both the Ægean and the Mediterranean, and stretch, a tremendous wall of Nature's masonry, across Greece from sea to sea.

Everything we see and every one we meet on the road is of interest, for all carry us back to the ancient days of glory and renown. We pass an occasional peasant in kilted skirt, who nods pleasantly to us and says, "Yassou" ("your health"). A veiled woman rides by, seated sideways on an ass, looking through the meshes of her veil in an opposite direction from the way in which she is going, but never deigning a glance of curiosity at the passing Americans; a donkey, laden with brushwood, looks like an animated woodpile, so completely is the little creature covered with his load from head to tail; a farmer, plowing the mellow soil with a crooked stick shod with iron—all these have been the commonplace sights of the road from Corinth to Cenchreæ from Paul's time to the present, but they are new and interesting to our unaccustomed eyes.

This part of Greece is very sparsely settled in these days. A few little villages dot the tableland between the seas, often cozily nestled behind tall cypress trees or Lombardy poplars; but fifteen or twenty little adobe houses would usually accommodate all their inhabitants. Three or four prosperous farms, with good brick houses and comfortable outbuildings, one also sees; but such signs of prosperity are very few and far between.

The traveler in Paul's time would probably meet a hundred people as he traveled to Cenchreæ where we meet one to-day, for a constant stream of traders and travelers then passed between the great emporium of Corinth and its busy port. Indeed, the two cities were connected by a high, continuous wall, which at times in their history was fortified with many towers, almost every trace of which has now disappeared. No busier thoroughfare probably was there in the wide world, nineteen hundred years ago, than this now deserted country lane.

Much of the land is sterile and barren, and has probably been denuded of its soil since the trees were cut from the mountains by Romans and Sicilians, Turks and Venetians. Still there are many fertile fields left; and as the plowshare turns the furrows that have been cultivated for three thousand years, the rich soil looks as if it might bear bounteously for three thousand years to come. In many places vineyards and orange groves and olive orchards relieve the stern majesty of the granite hills, and it is by no means an unpleasing prospect that greets the traveler to Cenchreæ, even in these degenerate days.

As we proceed, the road grows worse and worse. Sometimes it is simply a deep rut between two high banks. Again it makes its way over a rocky ridge, where all signs even of a rut disappear. Our ancient vehicle sways from side to side, as though it would topple over, and we assist the taciturn driver to keep its balance by shifting our weight from one side to the other, in accordance with his own movements, which are often very lively as he jumps from right to left, or back again, to avoid an overturn. At length the road ahead looks altogether too dangerous, and, much to the driver's satisfaction, we decide to dismount and go the rest of the way on foot.

But the journey is worth all it cost in danger and weariness. From the summit of the pass the view is magnificent. Before us the smiling harbor of Cenchreæ, with its encircling promontories and its lovely islands. Behind us the blue Gulf of Corinth and the western harbor of the once great metropolis; while around us on every hand, north and south and east and west, the great hills of classic Greece, each one the abode of some fabled god, each one alive with memories of a grandeur forever gone.

A quarter of a mile beyond the Cenchrean shore there is a tiny village of perhaps half a dozen huts, not near enough to interfere with our reveries or to break the solitude which broods over this ancient seaport. A single shepherd's hut stands on the shore, open and untenanted, where once was the bustle and traffic of a great seaport, where white-winged ships discharged their cargoes from Asia and Africa, or loaded the varied products of Greece for those distant shores. It is hard to bring back those old days, but we are helped to do so by the

MODERN PORTRAITURE OF CHRIST

THE events in the life of Christ which the Christian world commemorates at this season of the year often suggest inquiry as to how the divine Master really appeared as a man among men. Was he tall and strong of physique, or slight and frail? Was his countenance fair to look upon? What was the color of his hair and of his eyes, and did he really have the unutterably sad expression which the artists almost uniformly give to his face?

These and other questions relative to his physical personality naturally arise, and there is nothing irreverent in their consideration. During the medieval period, and for some centuries afterward, certain artistic and ecclesiastical conventions restricted more or less the painters and sculptors who essayed to portray Christ's form and features. As so many works of art in those days were executed for church adornment, architectural considerations were influential in determining the forms and character of the compositions, and in paintings and windows for churches artistic conventions like the halo, and certain poses or groupings of the sacred personalities were adopted. But with emancipation from ecclesiastical dictation, the artists of our own day have been free to give us more realistic interpretations of Biblical subjects, and Christ and his disciples and contemporaries have been presented in a guise which we recognize as more human, more as our reason and knowledge of the time tell us they must have appeared.

It is singular that none of the four Evangelists goes into details as to the personal appearance of Christ. There is a tradition that St. Luke painted a portrait of him, but of this there is no certainty. The early Christian authors were by no means concordant in their opinions about the Master's physical aspects. Some denied him all beauty, while others regarded him as the most beautiful of all mankind. There were great confusion and inconsistencies in his portraiture for centuries, and it was the task of the Middle Ages to reduce the multitude of concepts of the likeness of Christ to a unity, a task which required centuries for its completion. To understand this, we must remember that in the early church there was at first little in the way of art. The first Christians, remembering the physical perfection in which the heathen had clothed the gods of Olympus, seemed to find a pleasure in breaking loose from this adoration of personal endowments, and in taking as their ideal of the bodily aspect of our Lord, Isaiah's picture of a patient and afflicted sufferer. The first Christians feared to indulge their tastes in the direction of art, lest they fall under the suspicion of worshiping divinities of stone like the heathen. The first efforts at art, like those of the Catacombs, were usually in the form of symbols. When attempts were at length made to portray Christ himself they usually represented him in the form of a shepherd, the figure customarily being youthful.

"Suffer the little children to come unto me"

From a painting by Otto Walter Beck

It was not until some time during the fourth century that Chrysostom and Jerome laid emphasis upon the beauty of Jesus. Details of his supposed appearance are given in a letter to the Emperor Theophilus, attributed to John of Damascus. Nicephorus Callistus, who introduced his picture of Christ with the words "as we have received it from the ancients," was impressed with the healthful appearance, stature, brown hair, not very thick but curling, black brows, not very fully arched, sea-blue eyes, shading into brown, beautiful glance, beard of moderate length, long hair and olive and somewhat ruddy complexion of the oval face.

It will thus be seen that the modern artists have much room for the play of their imagination. The present-day tendency toward realism, and toward depicting Christ as magnetic and majestic in face and form, has been marked among them. Gustave Doré and Bastien-Lepage were among the pioneers in the movement. Tissot's great work in the realistic and historical portrayal of Biblical themes and characters has done much to revolutionize the ideas of the public on the subject, and also to give truer insight into the characteristics of Oriental life, which have changed so little in the passing centuries.

An American artist who has gone very far on realistic lines in this field is Otto Walter Beck of Brooklyn Borough, New York, whose paintings of Christ were recently exhibited at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. Perhaps one of the most enjoyable of Mr. Beck's pictures on such subjects is entitled, "Suffer the Little Children to Come unto Me." It is typical of modern work in that it represents the Master in quite the opposite from the ancient traditional view. Here he is pictured with groups of little ones gathered joyfully about him, happiness and affection in their countenances and attitudes and something closely akin to happiness in his. The writer does not remember to have seen a painting of Christ which portrayed him in a mood so nearly that of happiness, and the idea of the artist evidently was to show him completely in sympathy with the innocent joy of the young people who sought him. All the exuberant pleasure of young life seems to be expressed in the rich hues of the costumes, faces, and accessories. Yet there is nothing irreverent or inappropriate in the artist's treatment of the theme. He has given the divine Lover of children a beautiful face, which combines tenderness with strength and masterfulness.

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF ST. PAUL

ancient bricks and stones which line the shore and are sometimes built up into the semblance of a wall. A semi-circular row of great cut stones, with other blocks of stone extending out into the water, indicate doubtless the remains of one of the ancient piers, and an occasional bit of unbroken marble reminds us of the glory which once was Cenchreæ's.

If the works of man are forever lost, the glories of nature remain the same from age to age, and I can truly say that there are few more charming spots in all the world than old Cenchreæ. I have sailed into the wonderful mountain-encircled harbor of Rio de Janeiro, and the magnificent bay of Sydney, into the strikingly beautiful port of Foochow in China and our own charming harbors of San Francisco and Seattle and the Portland of the Atlantic Coast; but never have I seen a more lovely combination of mountain and shore, of promontory and island, of sea and sky and fleecy cloud than in this old harbor of Cenchreæ on this December day.

Beautiful shells, many-colored flowers of the sea, stirred by the incoming tide, and sea-urchins in purple and yellow and blue tempt one to wander for hours upon the shore; and whenever we lift our eyes only scenes of beauty and grandeur meet them. Not a single habitation of man, if we may except the deserted shepherd's hut, is in sight; only a solitary plowman on the hillside in the distance emphasizes the solitude of the scene.

We cannot help remarking to ourselves: "What a glorious winter resort this would be were Cenchreæ in Switzerland instead of Greece! What palace hotels would spring up on these shores! What splendid highways would be built!" for there is no spot in the land of the Switzers that combines more of the beautiful and the sublime than the lovely bay of Cenchreæ.

Yet, after all, I am glad that the hotel proprietor has not exploited these shores and built his funiculars up these mountain sides. I am glad the road is so difficult and the place so solitary, for we can so much the better transport ourselves back to Paul's days than if a commissionaire dogged our footsteps, or hotel waiters looked for tips at every turn. We can more easily imagine Paul here to fulfil his vow before he took ship for Ephesus and Syria, and picture to ourselves his faithful companions of the church which we know existed in Cenchreæ.

To one of the prominent members of this church Paul introduces us. This was Phœbe, a "deaconness" of the church. We know that she was a widow, probably of considerable wealth, for we are told that, according to Greek custom, she "could not have been mentioned as acting in the independent manner described in Romans, either if her husband had been living, or if she had been unmarried." Of her Paul speaks these gracious words: "I commend to you Phœbe our sister, who is a ministering servant of the church at Cenchreæ; that you may receive her in the Lord, as the saints should receive one another, and aid her in any business wherein she needs your help; for she has herself aided many, and me also among the rest."*

What a noble biography is condensed in this paragraph! We know also that she was greatly trusted by the apostle, for as she was about to sail for Rome, he gave to her his letter to the Roman church. O woman! greatly beloved and honored, to be the bearer of such an epistle not only to Rome but to the whole Christian world!

We know little more about the church in Cenchreæ, but I was interested to find that there is to-day, small and dilapidated as is the little village, a Church of God in Cenchreæ, and to be able to take a picture of it in all its bare and homely simplicity.

A little square, whitewashed building it is, built of adobe bricks, standing a quarter of a mile back from the water. A small bell hangs from two poles near by, and behind it is a forlorn little graveyard, with two or three unmarked graves and one with a rude box at the head, which sheltered an oil lamp.

The door was unlocked, as is common with Greek churches at all hours. No one was within sight, and we reverently entered, to find a pitiful little sanctuary, which would hold perhaps twenty people if all were standing. There were no seats. A large, rude picture of the Christ, surrounded by the four evangelists, leaned against the wall; a shabby altar surrounded by a few icons, or holy pictures of the saints, two greasy candlesticks, with iron points on which to impale the candles, which form so large a part of Greek worship, and a dirty wooden reading-desk was all we saw. The only thing of beauty in the little church was the marble mosaic floor, a relic, no doubt, of the departed glory of ancient Cenchreæ.

There is little more to tell about Cenchreæ. One of its coins is still extant, representing on one side the head of Antoninus the emperor, and on the other the port with a temple on each of the two promontories which enclosed the bay, exactly as we see them to-day, with a statue of Neptune on a rock between them. Pausanias tells us that the road from Corinth to Cenchreæ led through a fine avenue of pine trees, and that the traveler passed many tombs on the way, among the most important being those of Diogenes the Cynic and Thais the profligate. Over this road Paul often journeyed; but what a contrast his pure and joyous life was to that of those whose tombs he passed!

Here, it is said, Diogenes, when alive, was visited in his tub by Alexander the Great. When the emperor asked what he could do for him, the philosopher sourly replied: "You can stand out of my sunlight." Paul never made such an ungracious reply to emperor or commoner. He sought men and did not flee from them; sought them to save, and never repulsed them. No cynical word fell from his lips, but many a cheerful exhortation to "rejoice evermore," and "again I say, rejoice."

I shall ever be thankful for the privilege of following in Paul's footsteps from Corinth to Cenchreæ.

What Are You Doing for Christ?

IT IS impossible to estimate how great the boon will be to America of having her men stirred by the sound of such a call as is being made by the Men and Religion Forward Movement. Few men will dare dispute the fact that it is one they ought to heed. American men have had a habit of responding to a call of duty when it is made clear. The next step onward will be to follow this new, clear summons of the church.

"Are you a Christian?" asked a modest little Salvation Army lassie of a gentleman sitting in the hall.

"That's my business," he answered sternly.

"Yes," she agreed. "And God has sent me here to tell you that you are not tending to your business."

Have the men of America been really attending to their business? Are they ready to begin now?

Many a man boasts that his deepest motive is to accumulate sufficient property to leave his children well provided for. Does he realize that the richest provision he can make for his family is to leave them the memory of a father who was full of faith and good works?

You do not need to step outside your own town, probably not off your own block, or over to the next road, to find a task waiting that you can do for the church in Christ's name. Your first duty, as a father, as a citizen, is to give your heart to him. Dr. Washington Gladden declares that this movement is making "men see that religion is not a small and petty interest, that it covers the whole of life." Every worthy and useful thing can be done in the name of Christ, and is done better when done thus.

Your loyalty to him will lead you to kindly and practical tasks for those who have need of you—who are waiting for you. Do not delay till the church itself measures up to your ideal before you join its ranks. It is your duty to help make it better. In finance, in Bible study, in missionary interest, in work for boys, in work for the poor, in rescue of the erring, in efforts for civic righteousness, in countless forms of social service, within its doors and without, the church is waiting for your co-operation. Find the particular piece of work you can do best, then do it faithfully and gladly.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family is growing rapidly. We want every new reader of our paper, as well as all the old, to feel that religion is the main issue, to help us make America a land of homes whose mothers and daughters, whose fathers and whose sons shall labor nobly in the church for the Christ who brought us our liberty and light, and who is for the future our glorious hope.

Arbitrate the Coal Strike!

IF EVER there was an opportunity for demonstrating the value of arbitration, it is afforded in the present disagreement between the American coal operators and the miners. Here we have a situation which should be readily handled by arbitration. Here is a great industry controlled by a comparatively small number of capitalists, yet so vast and far-reaching are its ramifications that its temporary stoppage would result in injury to a thousand other industries. And if a strike were allowed to take place, when all was over, operators and workers would be millions of dollars poorer, distress would have invaded countless thousands of innocent homes, and hardship would have been needlessly inflicted on multitudes who have nothing to do with the quarrel and who should not be made to suffer. There is another phase of very great importance: such a strike would not only be unjustifiable, but it would be a blow at the business of the entire country. Even if there were any great vital principle at stake—which there is not in the present instance—it would still be the duty of both parties to the controversy to recognize the transcendent importance of national interests and to arrange a conciliatory settlement. It is not a question of a larger or smaller margin of profit to the operators, nor yet is it one of an insignificant advance demanded by the miners. In pressing their respective claims to a clinch, culminating in a strike, they would be fighting over each other's shoulders and would do far more damage to the people generally, and to the industrial interests of the country, than to themselves.

This is an unthinkable situation, and one which makes arbitration imperative. Both sides must get together and take counsel. Since the Federal Government has taken a hand in the trouble with a view to conciliation, there is strong hope of a peaceful solution. There is a deep popular conviction that all personal and private considerations—as far as these affect the anthracite operators and miners in the four States of Illinois, Ohio, Indiana and Western Pennsylvania—should yield before a great public necessity. The business of the whole country, the transportation of the mails, and the uninterrupted operation of a thousand industries should not be allowed to suffer through a dispute which is so clearly negotiable. Let us hope that the spirit of compromise will prevail, that concessions will be made on both sides, and that we may be able to show to the world a magnificent illustration of practical arbitration, on a basis which shall be both just and generous.

Why Not a Peace Year?

THE Hon. Winston Churchill, First Lord of the British Admiralty, stood up in the House of Commons in London the other day and had a heart-to-heart talk with Germany. His words, addressed directly to the British Parliament, were spoken almost as directly to the German Empire.

Mr. Churchill ventured to suggest to the Kaiser's government that it take a year's holiday from warship building. He pointed out that this would not only save the German people from thirty to thirty-five million dollars, but would also be the equivalent of destroying five British "super-Dreadnoughts"; for Mr. Churchill promises that if Germany takes a rest from naval shipbuilding in 1913 England will do the same. He informs Parliament and Germany that at least for the next four or five years the British Government will insist on keeping its equipment of battleships and battle cruisers sixty per cent. stronger than that of the German Empire.

Mr. Churchill's frank and simple suggestion might well be taken seriously by all the nations of Christendom. The people of every European nation would joyously hail release from the bitter burden of taxation for naval armaments. The naval appropriation asked for in Great Britain alone for the coming year is $220,427,000. This sum would go far toward solving some of the economic woes of the British people. And when it is realized that this great amount of money is being asked for only because Germany and the other nations are also adding proportionately to their navies, the thing becomes preposterous.

Why not a peace year in 1913? Great Britain has been brave enough to suggest it. Let Germany be brave enough to accept the suggestion. With the two leading nations of Europe leading the way, the rest would find it easy to follow.

Germany will be tempted to insist that she does not build her navy to match Great Britain's, but only to protect her own interests and do her own work. But each nation knows perfectly well, and England has confessed, that its naval plans are largely measured by what it thinks the other is going to do. War, so far from being a business of patriotism and glory, sometimes looks, in the light of a commonsense, straightforward proposition such as this of Mr. Churchill's, like a cruel and ridiculous game.

Everybody in Europe would be better and happier if there were no warships built in 1913.

Foolish Counsel

WE REGARD it as being generally admitted that the worst calamity that could happen to those who are advocating the extension of the suffrage to American women would be the adoption of the rash and disorderly methods that have been followed by a certain wing of the suffragists in England. This being the case, there is a natural hesitancy about accepting as accurate the extraordinary statements attributed by the newspapers to Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, president of the National Women's Suffrage Association, who is credited with announcing that "the time has come for Suffragists to use force." This was at a gathering of women in Philadelphia. Speaking later, Mrs. Shaw is credited with petulantly declaring that the attitude of the average American man toward American women is one he would assume toward children; that legislators listen year after year to the women's requests for the ballot and dismiss them with a smile; that it is time to stop such treatment, else the women may be driven to resort to militancy, and that she personally "would be glad to become a militant, if she is forced into it." Mrs. Shaw is a woman of brains and influence. She has always been regarded as well-balanced and conservative—a safe leader of her sex. Such a declaration as we have quoted, assuming the reports are true, will be regarded with astonishment by American women, who would never encourage the suggestion of a resort to the harsh tactics of the "Violent Sisterhood." By their aggressive conduct the English contingent have admittedly set back the cause of suffrage in that country indefinitely, and if Dr. Shaw proposes to lead a forlorn hope here in the same hammer-and-tongs fashion, it is easy to foresee a sudden and overwhelming change of the popular attitude on the question. Of course such talk may only be bluster; but it does not sound well from feminine lips. There is nothing in the situation here that calls for voluntary martyrdom.

The Day of the Farmer

IN NO branch of human industry is the wonderful inventive genius of the age doing greater service than in agriculture. It is the day of the farmer. No longer is he the slave of the furrow, tied down to a slow, laborious and unprofitable task with antiquated methods and implements compelling the hardest manual labor. To-day, the real farmer is a student as well as a worker, knowing more of the varieties and character of soils, plants and seeds, and understanding the chemistry of nature better than his forefathers ever did. Improved machinery, intensive cultivation and scientific methods of irrigation, overhead as well as under the soil, are making him a master of the art of productivity. Tens of thousands of farmers are benefiting by the great impulse scientific research and mechanical skill are giving to agriculture. Soon the lone figure of the farmer at the plow will be an anachronism, and our poets and painters will have to deal instead with the throbbing traction engines, three of which linked together are capable of pulling a mighty chain of mechanical plows stretching across a vast field and cutting fifty-five fourteen-inch-deep true furrows with a splendid precision. This remarkable illustration of labor-saving serves to show how fast the world is progressing and what a wide gap has opened between the old day of the weary plowman, struggling along behind Dobbin in the furrow, and the present time, when the achievements of science have placed the progressive farmer at the head of the world's productive agencies. And it is his rightful place, for whatever others may do, it cannot be forgotten that "the farmer feeds them all."

Burial of the "Maine"

THE dismantled, torn hulk of the battleship Maine was towed from Havana Harbor out three and one-half miles from the coast of Cuba, and sunk in one thousand fathoms of water. She was in tow of the naval tug Osceola, and as a funeral escort she had the cruiser North Carolina, bearing the bones of the forty-seven bodies recovered from the wreck; the scout cruiser Birmingham; the Cuban gunboat Hatuey, with President Gomez on board; the Cuban gunboats Yara and Isla de Cuba; the yacht Gipsy and many other craft. Salutes were fired. A large American flag was the last thing to disappear, and the roses with which the deck of the Maine was covered floated on the water over the place where the ship went down. Most impressive memorial services were held in Havana, American and Cuban flags being at half-mast. Business was suspended, and the bones of the men in metal caskets covered with flowers lay in state in the council chamber of the city hall adjoining the president's palace, and tens of thousands paid respectful homage. A memorial address was made by Rev. Dr. John P. Chidwick, chaplain of the Maine. New York City very generally joined in the burial service of the Maine. At that hour bells tolled, flags flew at half-mast, and men, women and children halted in silence in honor of the heroes. Other cities in this country also remembered the Maine. When the ill-fated vessel had been sent to its grave the North Carolina bore the precious bones of the patriots back home, where they were interred in the National Cemetery at Arlington. The President of the United States and other distinguished men took part in the solemn exercises. All over the nation there was the halting of the step and hand of industry and the time of silence in sacred recognition of the sacrifices of the martyrs. Let the nation be congratulated that the too long delayed debt of gratitude has been paid, and let the survivors pledge deeper loyalty to the country and institutions to which they gave their lives. Of these worthies it can be truly said, in the words spoken to John in the Apocalypse:

Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them. (Rev. 14: 13.)

The Burial of the "Maine," the Last View as the Hulk Sank

Singular Lighthouse Heroism

BY WIRELESS from the Canadian government steamship Seal there is told the story of the finding on Bird Island of a woman and her baby half starved and suffering from exposure which they had endured for ten days following the drowning of Peter Borque, the lightkeeper—their husband and father. The Seal was attracted to the lighthouse by signals of distress and a boat's crew found Mrs. Borque so weak that she could barely crawl along the decks. It is feared the baby will die. Borque ten days ago fell from the lighthouse and was drowned. Every day and every night since, Mrs. Borque told the Seal's men, she had been awake. "I have kept the beacon constantly going, and at intervals of five and ten minutes kept the lighthouse bell tolling in the hope that some vessel would appear and send men to our assistance," said the stricken woman. "For a day after my husband was drowned I thought I would go mad, but then I realized that I must be brave and care for the work which had cost his life until word could be sent to the government. My baby suffered terribly from the cold and cried constantly, but all I could do was to keep the little one in my arms and carry it with me every time I crawled into the light tower to trim and fill the lamps and keep them burning. Several times I thought I heard the horns of vessels in the thick fog which for days enveloped the lighthouse, but none of them came where I could see them, and apparently they did not hear the tolling of the bell. At the end of the sixth day something kept whispering to me, 'Keep up your courage; a ship is coming,' and that premonition is all that kept me alive. I cried with joy when I saw the Seal, and I hope that God will hasten the day when we can be taken from this place, where I have had the greatest sorrow of my life." Mrs. Borque and her child will be provided for as long as they live by the Canadian government. The sacrifice of this man's life in saving the lives of others, the singular heroism of the wife taking her husband's place that lives might be saved are beautiful examples to the world, and typify the glorious heroism of those who care for the spiritual lights along the shore to save from wreckage the tempest-tossed mariner. Such fidelity to trust calls to mind the divine injunction:

Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life. (Rev. 2: 10.)

Village Starved to Death

BY a telegram from St. Petersburg it is just learned that the entire population of a small fishing village in Nova Zembla is dead of starvation. The cemetery is full, showing that the few dead persons who were found uninterred had buried those who died first. The vessel which was to take food supplies to the village was held fast by the ice for months, and when it got through the people for whom the food was destined were dead. The Russian Minister of the Interior has notified the cabinet that he will ask for a further sum for the relief of starving peasants in various parts of the empire. This will bring the total sum expended thus far up to $65,000,000. It seems a pity and shame that, with so many fertile acres and such large harvests of wheat, corn, rice and other products, a single child of earth should be allowed to die of starvation. It is fortunate that the charity of the race is so broad and intense and practical, and it will not be long till the story of the death of a single person on the earth from starvation will be the rarest thing. In some of the lawless and crime-cursed communities of our civilized times it seems that multitudes of people are perishing with spiritual starvation in imitation of the one described by the evangelist.

And I perish with hunger! (Luke 15: 17.)

Atlantic States Storm-Swept

A WIND and rain storm of a severity unparalleled in recent years swept across the South Atlantic Coast States, leaving behind it a path of wrecked buildings, bridges torn from their foundations, uprooted telegraph and telephone poles, and in several instances dead bodies. Five persons were killed outright in Headland, a few miles below Troy, Ala.; two others were hurt mortally and four or five were injured. In Spartanburg, N. C., two persons were killed, and two lost their lives in Raleigh, N. C. Railroad traffic was paralyzed by the carrying away of bridges and by landslides and floods. At Greensboro, N. C., two bridges were carried away. In Raleigh trains were wrecked, and a power plant destroyed. Rivers and creeks in the Piedmont section of the State overflowed their banks, causing washouts on the railroads and great damage to property. At Farmburg, Va., three houses were blown down. The city of Petersburg was flooded, and trolley traffic was suspended, the streets being turned into miniature rivers. The ravages of the storm reached from as far south as Savannah, Ga., to Connecticut. From Savannah came news that the rainfall was unprecedented and had caused freshets in nearly all the streams. Train schedules were disarranged and the service tied up. For a storm so far-reaching and so severe the loss of life was singularly light, and yet the $200,000 damage at Atlanta was not to be compared with the loss of precious lives. Most of the millions of inhabitants were sheltered in lovely homes and in the arms of a tender Providence. Storms have a place in the calendar of nature and in the plans of God for the purification of the atmosphere, the health of the people and the benefit of the soil, and it is our duty to adjust ourselves to them. The prophet recognizes the divine mastery of the violent forces of nature.

The Lord hath his way in the whirlwind and in the storm, and the clouds are the dust of his feet. (Nah. 1: 3.)

King Helps Cripple Boy

A WELSH lad, Idris Thomas, who recently had both his feet amputated owing to tuberculosis, received from King George a gift of money to enable him to buy artificial feet. The boy painfully made his way to Buckingham Palace recently for the purpose of personally thanking the king, who, however, at the time was absent. Hearing of the call and the lad's disappointment, King George sent for him and received him. The king gave him a scarfpin as a memento of the occasion and sent him to the Treloar Cripples' Home, where he will be taught a trade. This is a beautiful act upon the part of the king. It reminds us of his grandmother Victoria's love for the children of the poor. Helping the poor little cripple is so much more masterful a thing than killing tigers in a jungle, so much more royal an act than sitting on a throne or wearing a crown, so much more manly a thing than presiding at social or official functions! Time was, not very far back, when the people lived to serve the rulers; now rulers live to serve the people. That king is highest in the affection of his own people, and in the estimation of the world, who stoops to serve the lowest, the poorest, the weakest subject of his realm. The royalty of sympathy and love is thus described in the ideal kingdom:

Mercy and truth preserve the king: and his throne is upholden by mercy. (Prov. 20: 28.)

Constancy at Sunday School

SAMUEL WINTERTON, of Keyport, N. J., holds the world's record for perfect attendance at Sunday School. On September next he will have completed fifty consecutive years of perfect attendance at the First Baptist Sunday School in Keyport. He has been in his accustomed seat every Sunday. A wonderful record is that—in his place every Sunday without a single exception for half a century. Providence has been good to Mr. Winterton in giving him such splendid health. There are others who would have been as faithful if they had had the physical strength. It was much more than good health that took him to the Lord's house every Sunday: it was a love for the Bible, a desire to learn more of its saving truth, and a loyal determination to support the Sunday School, the powerful arm of the church. The man has a constancy in his nature that is rare, and as beautiful as rare. Compare this man with numbers who have a feeling of insufferable weariness after a few months or years of work in the Sunday School or other departments of church work. How well do pastors appreciate this constancy in the church membership! The apostle enjoined it:

Be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord. (I. Cor. 15: 58.)

Spring Chats at the Open Window

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

One Woman's Pluck

ONE bitterly cold day last winter, when the north winds were out and the rural mail had to be delivered in the teeth of a freezing gale, a mail-carrier in the neighborhood of White Plains, N. Y., was suddenly taken ill. It was impossible for him to proceed on his route, and as he had started on his rounds, the delivery of mail would have been delayed had it been necessary to send back to the post office for a substitute. Equal to the emergency, his wife stepped into the mail cart, and with a bravery and pluck that compel admiration she drove twenty-six miles over rough and icy roads, stopping to deliver the mail at every point and to gather it up. She reported at the post office at the end of the journey, and though very weary, was by no means exhausted or fatigued beyond endurance. All honor to Mrs. Girling. She has added one name more to the list of everyday heroines who, from time to time, show that on occasion they can step forth from the shelter of the home and do as hard work as men may on the open road.

Women before now have piloted ships through deep seas, have acted as conductors and engineers on railways, and have been found undaunted in the face of danger. Women are always brave to suffer and endure, show fortitude and courage in their own persons and in nursing the sick, and have a claim upon the enthusiastic belief of all chivalrous men. When a great poet stoops to write a catchy ballad with the refrain that "the female of the species is more deadly than the male," it moves one to wonder whether his hand is not losing its cunning. No man born of woman should outrage the love he bears his mother, wife, daughter and sister by condescending to anything so cheap.

The training of girls to-day includes so much in the line of athletics that they compare favorably with boys in physical strength. Gone forever are the days when the ordinary woman in good health was afraid to venture out on a stormy or cold day. The college student plays basket ball, and, though the game is a rough one, does it with a vigor and address that make her not inferior to her brothers. Indoor exercise girls may still have, and she who can make a bed, sweep a room and cook a dinner is pretty well equipped for most occasions in life. Still, it requires energy and ability of no mean order to make a woman of the all-around type, to which Mrs. Girling evidently belongs. She saved a trying situation, and what more could be done by any one?

Home Economy

THERE is thrift in wise spending, as there is in wise saving. Under pressure of hard times, the heads of the household often have to sit down and consider where to retrench. We are lavish in this country by habit, and no doubt we shall always continue to be so. The small economies of the French and German housewife are seldom practiced by an American housekeeper, unless she has had the good fortune to be trained by an unusually sensible mother. When people seriously take up the matter of income and outgo, they ought to regard that which is of permanent value as worth more than that which is necessarily transient. For example, it is of minor importance whether an old overcoat or a last year's suit is made to do duty for another season. Neither boy nor girl is at all the worse for self-denial so far as the fashion of clothing is in concern. Most of us think too much about what the neighbors may say. In the effort to keep up with other people, we use up time and strength to no advantage. What we spend on good literature for the home, on the bright and breezy magazine that week by week and month by month adds to the family stock of ideas and helps in the education of the children, is a good investment. A frugal New England woman denied herself in many little ways, but purchased a costly encyclopedia, an up-to-date dictionary and a world atlas for the profit of her nieces and nephews. She said that she did this in the interest of good economy. In the long run she was proved to be right.

Hostess and Guest

THE relations of hostess and guest are reciprocal. Neither should neglect the other. An invited guest coming to stay for a week-end or longer should be made free of the home, and every provision for her comfort ought to be carefully made. The guest's room in its furnishings should include such little things as safety pins, needles and thread, note paper, envelopes and postage stamps, with pens and ink as a matter of course. A cake of toilet soap not hitherto used should be provided, and towels in abundance, the best that one has, ought to be on the rack near the pitcher and basin. If it is the family custom to use the same bathroom and lavatory, and no arrangement is made for the guest's convenience in her room, she must be notified of the time when the coast is clear and she is in no danger of embarrassment from meeting members of the family, or of delaying them if they have engagements.

A hostess frequently makes the mistake of providing a guest with nothing to read. One or two entertaining books and a magazine should be placed in the room that for the time being is the guest's own personal refuge. No guest room is well furnished in which there is not a Bible. A still greater mistake is made by the hostess who feels it incumbent upon her to divert and entertain the guest during every moment of her stay. It is by no means necessary to send Ellen to relieve Jane, and Maria to take Susie's place, so that the guest may never have a moment to herself. The hours between breakfast and luncheon ought to be entirely free for the family and the visitor, so that the occupations of the home may proceed without interruption, and the visitor may find for herself letters to write, a book to read, or something agreeable to do, without calling upon the resources of the household.

The question has been raised as to the church attendance of guests. Should a guest of one denomination attend church with her host who belongs to another, or go to the church of which she is a member? As a rule, courtesy on the part of the guest suggests that she attend church with the people whom she is visiting. She ought not to absent herself from family prayers, nor should she ever appear tardily at meals, or, if there are old people and invalids in the family, calmly appropriate easy chairs and sofas meant for them. On both sides, politeness and unselfishness ought to enter largely, and color the social intercourse of those who visit and those who entertain.

A "bread-and-butter letter," thanking the hostess for the pleasure the guest has had, should be written soon after the return home of the latter. Such a letter ought to be somewhat effusive. Never be afraid of demonstration in a letter of thanks or of friendship.

Easter at the Door
BY
MARGARET E. SANGSTER
KNOWN by many a sweet foretoken,
Many an age-long pledge unbroken;
By the silver slant of showers,
Peeping up from friendly flowers,
By the river all a-quiver with the little rippling waves,
By the sod that groweth greener on God's acre, thick with graves;
Known by many a sign and token,
Many a thrill of life unspoken,
Lo, we greet love's purest angel!
Here is Easter at the door.
Where the seeds in darkness burrow,
Where the grain is in the furrow,
There hath been divinest keeping!
Waking ever follows sleeping.
And for them who dread the morrow, aching for the voice grown dumb,
God lays up surcease of sorrow in the endless days to come.
Pain is brief, joy lasteth longer;
Death is strong, but life is stronger.
Lo! we greet love's mystic angel!
Here is Easter at the door.
Half have we forgot the measure
Of the tripping foot of pleasure,
Walked with pace grown slow and laggard,
Worn the face care-lined and haggard.
Spring itself rebukes us, bringing tonic for the heavy mood,
Stirs us to the lilt of singing with its ichor in our blood.
Love unbars the doubter's prison,
Faith assures us "Christ is risen."
Lo! we greet life's happiest angel!
Here is Easter at the door.

Eighteen Years a Subscriber

The Almanac is a great fund of information in itself. I have not yet had time to look into the book, Samantha, but know from the title it will be very amusing and well worth reading. I have been a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for eighteen years, and I look upon it as the best weekly paper. During all that time I have received many valuable premiums. It has often been a wonder to me how you could furnish such valuable works at so moderate a price. ARTHUR BOYLE.

THE DISCORD TREE

BY ANNIE HAMILTON DONNELL

THE apple-blows will soon be out, an' me here tied to a cane!" Miss Pantha's sigh had the gusty sibilance of near-anger. Miss Pantha's gaze, directed outward toward a huge tree some little distance from the house, was at once wistful and tinged with gentle ire. The cane, the cause of the trouble, tapped the floor restlessly. It was her sprained knee Miss Pantha was displeased with, and it was the Discord Tree she gazed at from her window.

"I declare, I believe I see pink on Sarah Blythe's half now! Seems just as if I do!" But her near-sighted eyes peered uncertainly. She did not want to see pink on Sarah Blythe's half of the Discord Tree unless she saw it on her own half, and there was no pink hint there. "I guess I don't," she added hurriedly.

Only the uneven nature of the ground sloping away from the weathered little house prevented Pantha Post from limping down to investigate at close range the branches of the great apple tree. But with a cane it would not be safe; one fall was enough. The sprain, which had been painful and tedious, was beginning to get better and any risk would be foolish. Miss Pantha, with another gusty little sigh, decided to be wise.

"'Nezzar, you go; there's a nice kitty! I'll give you my dinner an' yours too if you'll bring me back one little speck of a pink bud—from our side." But Nebuchadnezzar was not to be coaxed from his comfortable napping-place.

The Discord Tree bore great luscious apples with generous prodigality in apple-years, and took its lawful rest in the years between. It had been all its long life a tree of regular habits, as it had also been a prince of its line. Miss Pantha asserted to 'Nezzar, her only confidant, that royal sap ran in the veins of the Discord Tree.

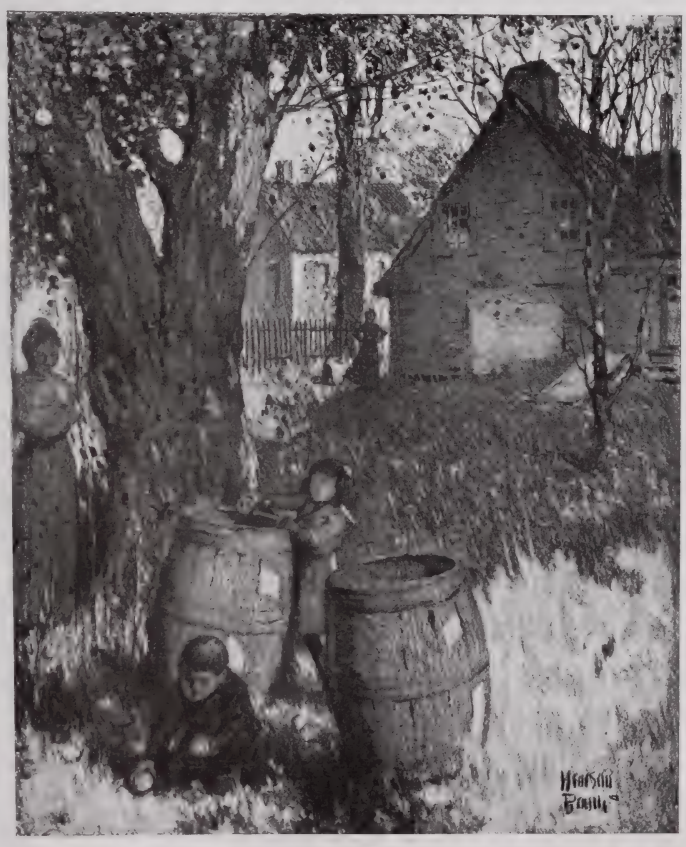
The tree's name was a matter of history; a former generation of Posts and of Blythes were responsible for it, though the individual sponsor was no longer distinct in the memory of Canaan Falls. That the ownership of the great tree had long been a matter of covertly bitter dispute between the two families was all that remained for the delectation of the present-day gossips of the little town. Some there were left, indeed, who claimed to remember when the "law" stepped in and drew the line directly through the Discord Tree, forever settling the question of rights. But these few were rambling and unsatisfactory in their rememberings, and no one quite credited the rather sensational embellishments to their tales. It was not even known in Canaan Falls what the original name of these magnificent great apples-of-discord had been; it had never been assuredly identified in the fruit catalogues that came with the regularity of spring to the more enterprising townsmen. It was the Discord Tree, and bore Discord apples. In a way it was a matter of envy to all Canaan Falls.

This was apple-year. Miss Pantha's mouth had begun already to water. She limped difficultly and rather hazardously down her steep cellar stairs to inspect her stock of barrels, and decided there would not be enough. In good years the Discord Tree had borne almost miraculously, and what reason was there to suppose this would not be a good year? Miss Pantha had seen a load of new barrels turn into Sarah Blythe's yard—so Sarah Blythe was anticipating a good apple-year.

"We've got two bushels an' a half to make up, 'Nezzar; it's got to be a good one!" The curious twist of Pantha Post's lips from their ordinary thin, straight line stood for humor; it was a dry and lonely species. "Sarah Blythe got ahead of us year before last—you ain't forgot, have you? I'd remember that if I was a cat! We've got to get two bushels an' a half more Discords this year than what Sarah Blythe gets from her side of the tree."

The warm, budding weather refused to wait for the convalescence of the sprained knee, and before it was safe to hobble on a cane down the long uneven slope to the Discord Tree, a very definite tinge of soft carmine flushed the great tree even to Miss Pantha's defective vision. The "apple-blows" had come out. A curiously one-sided effect struck terror to her soul, but with dominant will she refused to credit her eyes. The rose cloud was not confined to Sarah Blythe's side! Such an insult of Nature was not for a moment to be believed. Yet the terror grew to a smarting pain of indignation.

"I'll go down there an' see what's goin' on!" Miss Pantha cried. "I'm not goin' to sit here in a chair an' let a thing like that happen before my face an' eyes! It couldn't happen—it ain't so! But I'm goin' down an' see." Her hand encountered the soft fur bulk of Nebuchadnezzar in her lap and her anger flared; there was no one else to be angry with. "Oh, if I was a cat with four legs to walk on, without a cane to any of 'em, I'd go myself instid of lettin' my poor mistress! I'd come back an' report there was blows all over that tree, on every identical branch!"



"There were two barrels under the Discord Tree—and two children filling them, an apple apiece into each"

But she was driven into going herself, although with shameless coolness 'Nezzar tagged behind. She waited until the edge of night for fear of being discovered by her rival's sharp eyes. It was indeed so dark she would scarcely have been the wiser for her painful trip if she had not had recourse to her sense of touch.

"They smell all over the tree, 'Nezzar," she whispered, the heavy-sweet scent buffeting her face in velvet whiffs at every puff of breeze. "Seems as if Sarah Blythe's blows wouldn't smell like that!" But she delayed making her test in the dark. She was afraid to make it.

The big tree had peculiar conformation. It might have had the effect, to one imaginatively inclined, of having been trained in its youth to be a dividing-tree, half one owner's and half another's. It certainly had grown consistently to that end, for its main trunk divided a few feet above sod into two symmetrical twin trunks, of which one was Miss Pantha's and one belonged to Sarah Blythe. There was little to choose between the branching trunks; rather there had heretofore been little to choose. In this good apple-year Nature, by some whimsy known only to herself—perhaps an inconsequent, elfish whimsy of her sex—had played a trick on Pantha Post. Leaning on her cane and groping at last over the twigs and branches within her reach Miss Pantha discovered the trick. Her fears were verified. Her half of the Discord Tree had failed her utterly, while Sarah Blythe's half, over there, taunted and tantalized her with a thousand sweet-scented little voices. She limped back to her lone little house, hot at heart. Sarah Blythe was the embodiment of her wrath; it was as if Sarah had leagued with Nature—the two of them together—to flout her.

It was not necessary to look in the daylight, yet she found herself gazing next day from a half-way vantage point in the eager hope of disproving her test of the previous night. There were no apple-blows on her half of the Discord Tree. What could not happen had happened.

"Now if I decide to take one of Anthony's poor little mites there won't be a single identical Discord for him to set his teeth to! I was goin' to give him the run of 'em—children are so fond of apples. I've taken a sight o' comfort thinkin' how he'd relish 'em." She had never arrived at the decision, but here and now, in the presence of this calamity, the little son-mite of her old lover, Anthony Cushing, seemed to have suffered actual deprivation of his rightful apportionment of Discords.

Anthony Cushing long years since, in his role of village beau, had been the "lover" of many Canaan maids — of Sarah Blythe as well as of Pantha Post. Both had been in their turn recipients of his fickle favor. Sarah's turn had come first, which to inflammable Pantha had been matter for secret ire. That old rivalry still seeped and boiled at times in her fifty-year-old breast, and may or may not have had its share in her vacillating decisions to "take," or not "take," Anthony's orphaned little son. Let Sarah Blythe take him!

Anthony had died in his forties and Pantha had still a clear, sad little vision of his beautiful dead face as she "viewed" it according to country fashion from her place in the solemn line at the Canaan church. She had her moments of poignant grief for the Anthony so many had shared with her—a fickle, joyous, lovable Anthony. He had been her only lover; she had of necessity to make what poor best she could of her short lease of Anthony. It was at those gently sorrowing moments that Miss Pantha had come nearest to "taking" the little orphan son. She could not bear the thought of Anthony's boy being in an asylum. She had even, at one particular mourning period, got as far as packing her bag to go to the city for the child. One or two of the articles of wear had remained packed, in readiness for a possible recurrence of the good impulse.

There were reported to be two little orphans, one of a kind, as Miss Pantha's thought expressed them. Anthony's meek and ineffectual little wife, his final and belated choice, had succumbed to her widowhood within the year and the children from lack of other place to go had been bundled into the nearest asylum. From time to time Pantha Post or Sarah Blythe had heard reports of them. Pantha had wrestled with herself afresh at each report. She had, deep within her, a passionate yearning to undress or dress a little child and to feel a warm little body in her arms. But Miss Pantha with feminine inconsequence was afraid of children. So, though not naturally of a vacillating disposition, she had vacilated.

The spring slid into summer in the easy manner of springs, and, radiant week by radiant week, summer slipped away. Miss Pantha's lameness disappeared; she lived her solitary, colorless days as best she might, but a new fear was upon her—the fear of growing old.

"You ought to know—you're old, 'Nezzar," she said. "How does it feel? It's pretty bad, ain't it? Heart o' mercy! I don't know how I'm goin' to bear it!"

It was while musing like this in a dreary fashion that she suddenly remembered that Anthony Cushing's little son was growing old, too! Every day, to say nothing of every week and month, was making him a little less of the little child she longed to hold in her lone arms—undress and dress. At this rate the little Anthony would soon be beyond undressing; he might already be beyond.

"An' I wanted to unbutton his little buttons!" sighed Miss Pantha as one bereft of the tender little office. "I wanted to button him!" She sat by her window gazing down a drear perspective. If she could travel it hand-in-hand with a little child—

"I will," Miss Pantha said with a startling suddenness that upset the dozing cat from her knees. All vacillation was at an end. She saw definitely, joyously, the child in her perspective; she felt the small hand in hers.

A panic of hurry seized her; she could not hurry fast enough. Another moment for Anthony's boy to grow old in was insupportable. She finished the packing of her bag begun months before and locked her house and went away. The big cat was the only witness of her departure.

"I've left you water an' some milk, 'Nezzar—you can eat it a little mite sour. An' you can hunt up field mice, but don't let me hear o' you catchin' any o' Sarah Blythe's rats! I'm not goin' to have her feedin' you. 'Nezzar, when I come back I'll have a dear little boy with me!" She was jubilantly happy, though a little scared.

The walk to the small box of a station did not take her by Sarah Blythe's; she was glad of that. She walked with a peculiar erectness as if of soul as well as body. She was no longer a decisionless, feeble-willed creature trembling at old age, but a creature transformed and militant, daring the years. She would have too much to do to grow old.

"Lordy, here's another comin'!" the old station-master exclaimed in aged excitement. "I never see the way Canaan Falls has took to travelin'—this is the third ticket I've sold to-day! You want a return, Panthy? Comin' back, be ye?"

"I'm comin' back," nodded Miss Pantha mysteriously. At another time she would have been curious about her two predecessors, but what did they matter to-day?

In sight of the big brick bulk of the asylum the old shyness clutched her, but could not turn her back. The children playing noisily in a great court at one side of the building were terrifying and formidable little imps, but she loved them all because one of them was Anthony's imp; it was her only way of loving him.

"The little Cushing boy?—Cushing? —Cushing?" deliberated the woman at the door with tantalizing hesitance. "Why, I'm not sure—I'm a new matron, just starting in—but as I think of it, the little Cushing boy has been adopted."

"Oh, no, he hasn't been! Oh, yes, there must be one! I mean—" Miss Pantha meant she could not bear disappointment. She had an instant for self-scourging that she had risked this disaster.

"But come right into the reception-room. I'll go and take their little census!" The new matron was smiling and plump. "I seem to remember that there's a little Cushing girl—"

"I must have a boy."

"Oh, if it's just a boy—there are boys enough. I can give you a regular little bargain in them! I'll bring some of them in for you to—"

"Don't!—wait! I mean I must have Anthony's—Anthony Cushing's, his father's, little boy. I came for him. He must be out there with the rest." She had the sense of having heard his little voice in the uproar of little voices. Anthony's boy must be out there!

"I'll do my best to find him! Take that chair—they're none of them any too comfortable." Then the smiling matron was gone and Miss Pantha waited alone. It was a stiff, unhome-like waiting-place. She felt herself stiffening as if by some congealing influence in the air, but it was because of the cold dread within herself.

"Will you please to button me?"

A small figure had backed up to her and stood patiently waiting to be buttoned. Miss Pantha saw bewilderedly the nape of a little brown neck and below it a row of china buttons with, across a little gap of underwaist, their complement of buttonholes.

"This is my best dress. I skited into it quick when I saw you a-coming. I can always tell an adopter—you're an adopter, aren't you? There's lots of 'em come an' I always skite, but it hasn't done any good so far." A soft sigh interrupted the chattering little voice, but it went on again. "I always put on my best dress—it helps me out. I need helpin' out. Are you specially particular about a han'some one?"

"A 'han'some one'?" repeated the bewildered adopter.

"Yes — orphan — han'some orphan. Mostly they are particular, but I didn't know but you—oh, I'm better than I look, honest I am! An' Tony's gone now—" This time it was a sob that interrupted. The sob struck Miss Pantha like a soft blow.

A curious thing had already happened to Miss Pantha. With the buttoning-up of that first little china button her fear of little children had evaporated. She was no longer afraid! She swept the small figure right-about-face and inspected the irregular little features, the freckles, the sob.

"What is the matter—is it because you want to be taken? You poor little mite! Who is 'Tony'?" she added as a sudden thought flashed through her mind. Tony — Anthony — who could tell?

"Oh, yes'm—yes'm indeed! That's exactly what! I was so hopin' the adopter who took Tony 'd take me too! I liked that adopter, an' besides it breaks twins' hearts to leave one of 'em here. I guess they don't have but just one heart an' it breaks that right in two—"

Miss Pantha stemmed the impetuous little tide. "Who is Tony?" she demanded. She felt curiously like sobbing herself and brusqueness was her only resort.

"Was, you mean — Tony was my dear, dear twin! I don't s'pose he ever will be again. I don't s'pose anything — not that you'll be my adopter, nor anything. It doesn't do any good. If you'll please to unbutton me I'll take off my best dress."

Buttoning and unbuttoning! Miss Pantha's denied little kingdom was coming to her. She caught the child to her and felt a warm little body against her breast—it had come.

She looked up from her armful as the matron entered.

"I'll take this one—get her clothes," Miss Pantha said. "If you want references, everybody in Canaan Falls knows Pantha Post."

So they went back together, hand-in-hand, Miss Pantha and her little woman-creature instead of Anthony's boy. But it was Anthony's little woman-creature. They walked up from the little box-station in the dusk; the child's dancing step seemed oddly to lend itself to Miss Pantha's elderly pace.

"I'm goin' to climb a tree!—you got a tree for me to climb?"

"I've got half o' one," Miss Pantha laughed. She laughed easily.

"Mercy gracious, what a funny tree! Maybe I couldn't climb half o' one!" She stopped in the road and peered upward, suddenly sobered. "Maybe it's like me an' Tony—a twin tree that was cut right in two. Maybe—it—hurt."

Miss Pantha started as if guilty. This was a new way to regard the Discord Tree. She walked on, still with the little hand in hers, but newly thoughtful.

All next morning the two of them were happily busy together. Miss Pantha had set about making little aprons, while the child talked merrily, and tried to help.

Out of doors October glowed. The Discords on Sarah Blythe's side had bloomed into a glorious red and mellowed in the sun. Miss Pantha caught the soft thud of them, now and then, as they dropped from the tree.

Late in the afternoon Miss Pantha missed the child from her side. She must have gone some distance away, for a hurried search failed to discover her. She was nowhere in the house, the sheds, the barn. Miss Pantha felt mild alarms.

It was almost evening of the beautiful October day and the Discord Tree stood up splendidly against the sky. The sound of little voices drifted to Miss Pantha from that direction. The child was at the Discord Tree!

There were distinctly two little voices. There couldn't be!—but there were. Miss Pantha found herself without apparent hesitancy hurrying down the uneven slope to the big tree.

"That one goes in my barrel—you made a mistake, Tony. Take it back! Take it back!"

"Oh, well, take it, Miss Ole Stingy! This one's the biggest." But the boy-voice was not angry; it was full of a joyous quality good to hear. And the joyous quality of the little girl-voice!

There were two barrels set side by side under the Discord Tree and Miss Pantha's amazed gaze beheld the children—two children—filling them, an apple apiece into each. Sarah Blythe stood behind them directing the work. When the children laughed Sarah laughed.

"Mine's most full—so's yours, Tony Cushing! An' I'm goin' to have exactly as many barrels as you're goin' to have! She says so," with a shy backward glance at Sarah Blythe. "We're goin' shares! An' I never knew who your adopter was an' you never knew who mine was—an' they're both nice. I love yours an' you love mine!"

Explanation unrolled itself slowly to Pantha Post. She stood under her half of the Discord Tree and read the beautiful riddle. Then they discovered her and that their secret was out.

"A s'prise! a s'prise! This is my Tony. I found him myself right under this tree!" her child was shouting. And Sarah's child was looking up at her out of Anthony Cushing's eyes and tinkling with Anthony's gay laugh.

"Pantha, where's your hand? Here's mine." It was Sarah reaching across the dividing line.

"Sarah—why, Sarah!"

"Why, Pantha Post!"

They were laughing together under the Discord Tree.

ACME QUALITY Paints have great tenacity

You know that sand and water will hold together fairly well in extreme cold. You know, too, that a little warmth or rough usage will soon cause them to fall apart. Some "paints" are put together on the sand-and-water principle — are made to yield a good profit to all but the man who eventually buys them and tries to make good use of them. Naturally, paints of that kind are quick to blister, peel, crack and fade. Do away with all doubt by using

On 120,000,000 Dishes Daily

Because of Its "Pure-Salt" Flavor

We figure that 120,000,000 dishes are flavored with Shaker Salt every day—an estimate based on the number of packages we sell.

Shaker is produced in a plant where we take from salt daily more than 5 tons of impurities. It is the cleanest salt that's known. It naturally follows that it has the true salt taste.

Shaker never clogs or cakes, even in dampest weather. Because it spreads in thinner layers and looks very white, some people think they are using more than they would of common salt. The fact is that by weight they are using less. Shaker grains are small. There are five grains of it to every one of common salt. And there's usually more real salt in four of these finer grains than in the one common grain.

China Under the Republic

BY MISS ALICE J. WHITTIER

A WONDERFUL day is dawning for old China. Her hour has come, and so marvelous a change is taking place that the world will soon sit up and take notice—not to say gasp. I do not believe there is such a crisis anywhere else in the world just now. It is the opportunity of an age.

Some of the missionaries feel that the great door of opportunity is opening now, and here we are all bunched in Shanghai and other ports! But I believe it is a sifting and an experience that will put fewer but better workers back on the field. And here, as elsewhere, or perhaps more than anywhere else, quality counts more than quantity. I want to see home and home folks, but I cannot bear to leave this old-new country just now.

A young Chinaman, not much more than a boy, came to bid a white friend good-by. She was inclined to laugh at his oddly cut hair and half-foreign clothes. Afterward she found out that he was a volunteer of the "Do or Die" corps, who throw bombs. They take them in their hands and run in among the enemy. He went to Nanking. Nanking has fallen, but he has not come back! There is a whole company of such boys in Shanghai.

The desire for a republic "like America" is very strong. Yesterday the streets blossomed out with a new flag, supposed to be the flag of the "Republic of China." It is just a long silken flag of five even stripes to represent the five peoples of China; Chinese, Manchus, Mongolians, Tibetans and tribes people (the "wild people" of western China). The colors are red, white, yellow, blue and black.

The foreigners are all down from Chengtu now. They tell stirring tales, but some of them think it was quite unnecessary to come to Shanghai, after having stayed through the siege. It seems that the viceroy at Chengtu, when finally obliged to give up and turn the government over to the republicans, supplied his soldiers with extra cash, and gave them a ten days' holiday. They took it wildly in a Chinese way, then deserted from the new government—which they hated at heart—and went to looting. But even in this they were wise enough generally to let foreign places alone. It is wonderful, with all the lawlessness and misery consequent on a revolution of such magnitude, that they do so little plundering of the foreigners. It has occurred only in a few places.

The "republicans" finally beheaded the viceroy at Chengtu and armed the civilians, with permission to shoot the deserting soldiers on sight. Some of the latter were killed and some of the plunder was recaptured. The excitement of the robbing and burning excited the consuls so that they ordered all the foreigners to leave. All did so except some French Catholic priests and nuns, and the consuls themselves.

One of the missionaries insists that there were money and provisions in plenty in Chengtu, and that order was nearly restored before they left, and that it would have been reasonably safe to have stayed. This missionary had to leave forty adopted girls there in the compound with only the doubtful protection of two Chinese families, so, of course, she feels it deeply.

When the little fleet of boats carrying the Chengtu refugees was passing one of the besieged cities, the besiegers fired on them. One baby's bed had a bullet through it, and another passed just over one of the men, cutting through some of his clothes, but no one was even touched. One of the lady missionaries was standing out on the front of the boat, watching the bullets strike the water along shore, and did not know till afterwards that the fleet itself was being fired at.

There are probably a hundred or so white people still left in Szechuen Province, instead of the thousand and over that were there before the war.

Helping the Little Chinese Orphans

DURING the past week, many letters have been received from friends of China throughout the country containing gifts for the Famine Orphan Fund. These timely contributions will gladden the hearts of the missionaries who plead for the support of 700 little boys and girls who came under their care as a result of the last famine.

The members of a Sunday School class in Grove City, Pa., gave a pie social and send the proceeds with the combined prayers of the class. E. W. "Our only regret is that we cannot make it many times larger," writes G. E. S., of Watertown, N. Y., and incloses twelve dollars from the members of his Bible class.

Miss I. S., Brooklyn, writes that a young Chinese, Ing Tai, to whom she gives Bible lessons, sends $5 for the orphans in his own country. Mrs. B. B. and Mrs. C. H. T., of Peryn, Calif., inclose half a dollar each with an earnest prayer for the increase of Christianity there.

The secretary of the Butler Sunday School at Washington incloses a generous donation. J. D. W. is a boy of twelve, and incloses some of his profits from chicken raising. "In memory of father and mother" is the inscription on a donation from Mrs. N., of Vermillion, O. Mrs. E. A. H., of Greeley, Colo., incloses "the widow's mite." Many other great-hearted men, women and children have responded to the call.

All gifts to this cause should be addressed to the CHINA FAMINE ORPHAN FUND, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Coal Troubles Nearing End

WHILE the probabilities of at least a formal strike in the coal mining industry in America increased toward the last days of March, the situation in Great Britain and Germany showed a decided tendency to clear up.

Thirty-two bituminous coal mine operators began a conference with thirty-two representatives of miners at Cleveland on March 20. The operators demanded a reduction of the present wage of 95 cents for a ton of lump coal to 85 cents. The miners demanded that the figure be increased to $1.05.

Mr. George F. Baer, president of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad, who is recognized as the leader of the anthracite mine operators, issued a statement on March 18 that the operators were willing to continue the conferences with the miners' committee. On March 25 representatives of the miners met in Cleveland to formulate the policies to be pursued by their organizations.

After the deadlock in the negotiations between the anthracite miners and operators, President Taft and Congress took active steps to avert a strike. Representative Esch, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill authorizing the President to investigate causes of labor disturbances, and Senator Townsend presented a similar bill in the upper house. The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce named a sub-committee to consider a bill presented by Representative Robert E. Lee, of Pennsylvania, authorizing the extension of the provisions of the Erdman Arbitration and Mediation Act, now limited to controversies between railroad companies and employees, to disputes between operators and workers of coal mines. President Taft requested the labor leader, Mr. John Mitchell, to come to Washington for a special conference.

In Great Britain, following the failure of the meeting of the representatives of the miners and owners to bring about a settlement, Parliament set wearily about the difficult task of formulating a bill which would meet the immediate needs of the situation. On March 18 Premier Asquith presented his minimum wage bill to the House of Commons. The original bill provided that a reasonable minimum wage be fixed in the various mining districts, the amount of the wage in each district to be fixed by district boards. No penal clauses were included to compel either side to obey the new law. The labor leaders demanded that a schedule of prices be included in the bill, and that provision should be made for forcing the owners to adopt the schedule. The bill is enacted to continue in force for three years.

Montessori, Trainer of Children

BY KATE UPSON CLARK

DR. SEGUIN'S works upon the development of defective children chanced some years ago to engage the attention of an Italian school teacher. She reasoned that the Seguin methods might work equally well with normal children. Thus it happened that in 1906, Dr. Maria Montessori was given entire charge of the schools in one of Rome's tenement districts, there to work out her theories.

"The House of Childhood," which she founded in Rome, has become a Mecca for the footsteps of many an educational pilgrim; and so successful have its experiments proved that the aristocratic private schools of Rome and many other cities are now practicing the methods which Mme. Montessori established for the tenement population.

Maria Montessori

In the Montessori schools there are no rewards, no punishments, no corrections, no rules for quiet, except the one great rule that no little boy or girl shall do anything that annoys or disturbs any one else. The teacher must study her pupils individually and affectionately. She must win their love. The influence of this love will make them good and will incline them to do whatever she wishes.

All of the old-time terrors and restraints have been banished from the Montessori schools. The children do not need to ask permission to speak, to move, to play. If they get tired of staying in one place, they can drag their little arm-chairs to another. If they want to stand or run, they can do it, always remembering that they must not disturb anybody else.

Mme. Montessori has no opinion of conventional discipline. It annihilates a child's personality, his individual power for thought and goodness." She considers the usual schoolroom, with its rows of awed and mechanical pupils, an appalling error.

There are no recitations in her school, no "classes," no "periods." Nobody need do anything that he or she does not really wish to do. The children do not suspect that the pieces of sandpaper and cardboard with which they amuse themselves for hours, the mechanical toys, the silk and leather cords, the knot-tying and game-playing, are "studies." They think they are only having a good time, while they are learning the deepest moral and intellectual lessons the child-mind can grasp.

Mme. Montessori asks a child if the sandpaper is rough or smooth. He may answer wrongly, but she does not correct him. She leaves him alone to think the matter out for himself. With letters pasted on blocks her pupils learn to write before they learn to read. By a certain little step-game they master the decimal system and easy counting. After many game-exercises in articulation, they begin to read. Every game has a direct educational value. The sense of touch, color-sense, reading, writing, arithmetic, all these and more, are taught in games; but the direct teaching, the corrections, the little restraints, of the Froebel system are banished by Mme. Montessori. She has gone much further than Froebel along his own road.

More than four hundred city and county superintendents of public education in various sections of our country have applied for information regarding the Montessori methods. The Boards of Education in Des Moines, Ia., and Omaha, Neb., are considering their adoption. The remarkable reports of the intense interest and concentration awakened in small children, and their rapid progress in intelligence and goodness under these new conditions, have attracted the attention of the entire educational world, as has perhaps nothing else in this department for a generation.

The "dottoressa," as Mme. Montessori is called, teaches children up to eight years of age. She is now said to be engaged in adapting her wonderful system to older pupils.

Among the Workers

—MISSIONARY A. R. KEPLER of Hunan, China, was visiting Hankow on business connected with the mission, when the recent battle occurred there. While assisting the Red Cross workers on the field, he was shot in the face by a bullet which was afterward extracted. He has returned to the United States for medical treatment.

—OWING to the recent unfortunate fire at the Mayesville (S. C.) Industrial Institute and the present high cost of living, the institute has fallen behind in its finances and incurred a debt which an effort is now being made to remove. Any reader interested in the Mayesville Industrial Institute may address Emma Wilson, Superintendent, at the Institute.

—MRS. M. N. VAN COTT, for many years an active and successful evangelist and soul-winner, whose ministrations will be remembered with pleasure by multitudes, is now, through age and infirmity, a "shut-in." Her eighty-second birthday is at hand. She writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that she would greatly enjoy a "birthday letter" from any of its readers. She adds: "I trust this is to be the most joyous birthday of my life." Her address is Catskill, N. Y.

—MISS ELIZABETH B. HARTWELL, of Chefoo, China, writes that Mr. and Mrs. Stooke, who have had charge of the Missionary Home, are contemplating retirement on account of age. There is still a debt of $450 on the Home and a strong effort is being made to clear it up through the contributions of friends who are willing to help the institution, which is invaluable to every North China missionary. Interested readers may address Mr. John Stooke, New Mission Home, East Beach, Chefoo, China.

—"IN THE LAST thirty-six years I have only missed attending church on sixteen Sundays." This is the testimony of Mr. Edward P. Briggs, of Kansas City, in his book Fifty Years on the Road. It is a fine record for a commercial traveler, and adds another proof to the long line of testimony that a successful salesman can be a successful Christian. Mr. Briggs's book is full of interesting reminiscences and bits of valuable advice to business men. He had many thrilling experiences during the Civil War while carrying on his work in States overridden with fighting armies. He frequently found it necessary to procure and present passes from military officials, and earned the reputation of not being afraid of bullets. Mr. Briggs states that at the time he began his work there were probably not more than a thousand traveling salesmen in the United States; the present number is estimated at 600,000. The book is the "story of a half century of honest salesmanship." It is published by Lyon & Armor, Philadelphia.

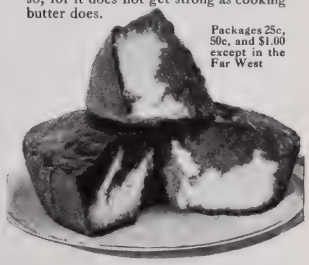
—A BRONZE BUST by Gutzon Borglum of Dr. J. M. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, was presented to the Methodist Episcopal Hospital in Brooklyn on February 26. Dr. Buckley was the founder of the hospital, the gifts which made possible its establishment, and particularly the gift of four hundred thousand dollars contributed by the late George I. Seney, being raised largely through his efforts. The property and equipment of the hospital are now valued at $1,200,000, with an endowment of $840,000. In the year 1911, 12,000 patients were treated. Dr. Buckley was made president of the Board of Trustees when the hospital was founded and has held the office up to the present time.

Crisco in Cake Making

MARBLE CAKE

Light Part	Dark Part
1½ cups sugar	1 cup brown sugar
¾ cup milk	½ cup Crisco; add salt
½ teaspoon soda	½ cup molasses
½ cup Crisco; add salt	½ cup sour milk
1 teaspoon cream of tartar	2½ cups flour
4 eggs (white only)	¾ teaspoon cream of tartar
2½ cups flour	¼ teaspoon soda
1 teaspoon vanilla	4 eggs (yolks only)
	½ teaspoon cinnamon, allspice, cloves and nutmeg.

A shortening richer than butter! You will think that such a product is impossible until you use Crisco where you now use butter. For example, use it in Marble Cake, which requires a cup of butter. The best creamery butter that you can secure is nearly one-fifth water, whereas Crisco is all shortening. There being no moisture in Crisco to dry out, Marble Cake made with it may be kept twice as long without loss of its original delicate flavor. You can secure this fine flavor at every season of the year, for Crisco never varies. You can realize that this is a decided improvement over cooking butter, which does vary in color, in flavor and in richness during the different seasons. Every package of Crisco is just as rich as your first one and remains so, for it does not get strong as cooking butter does.

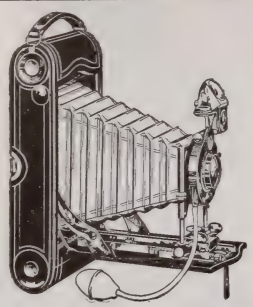


Packages 25c, 50c, and $1.00 except in the Far West

Use this recipe for Crisco Marble Cake. You will find that Crisco makes the white part equal to angel food in whiteness, and gives both the light and dark parts a fine, soft texture and a richer flavor than you ever have been able to secure before. You will find that it gives actually better results than butter, at half the cost.

On request, we shall mail a fully illustrated booklet, showing many other advantages of Crisco, the new and heretofore unknown, strictly vegetable product for frying, for shortening and for cake making. Address Dept. S, THE PROCTER & GAMBLE CO., Cincinnati, Ohio.

If it isn't an Eastman, it isn't a Kodak.



The convenience and simplicity of the

KODAK

as compared with a plate camera would make it worth while even if the pictures were no better—but they are.

Kodaks load and unload in daylight with film cartridges that weigh ounces where glass plates weigh pounds.

Kodak Films are superior to plates for hand camera work, not merely because they are light and non-breakable, but also because, chemically they are made to exactly meet the harsh lighting conditions which the amateur encounters.

By the Kodak system no darkroom is required for any part of the work, not even for developing as anybody can, without previous experience, develop films perfectly with a Kodak Film Tank, and get better negatives than are possible by the old dark-room method.

The Kodak system gives the amateur the widest possible latitude in the finishing of his pictures: He may use the daylight tank system, the dark-room method or mail his films to some professional finisher. It's just as he chooses.

A Story Hour in the Cozy Corner

The Giants of the North and South

A Legend of the Early Spring

EASTER—the return of the spring—is in many ways the most universally celebrated festival of all the year. There is a magnificent old Anglo-Saxon legend which tells how the sun gets up while the earth still slumbers lightly beneath a coverlid of snow, and dances for joy on Easter morning, which reminds me of a bit of rare old Irish folklore that I have never read nor heard of, save one cold March night on the north Irish coast by the Giant's Causeway, and in the little village of Donegal, where every one, from the tiny blue-eyed tots with their glossy black hair and cherry cheeks, to the yellowest old crones, with little hair or eyesight either, is as choke full of charming tales and rhymes and ancient runes as the proverbial egg is full of meat.

We had gathered around the peat-fire of "Ye Ancient Roof Tree Inn," and with a rich north-country brogue that could never be written down, the innkeeper, to the accompaniment of a very short and fierce storm, told us this unusual story in this unusual way, almost word for word as it is set down here.

Gathering Around the Fire

IT IS a long and uncommon cold winter we have had, aye, ladies? The Ogre of the South, I reckon, is sleeping sound enough to-night. He is tired. How can ye blame him? Through all the bitter winter that quiet watcher has valiantly fought the dreaded Ogre o' the North, with his minions biting ever nigher, nigher, threatening to blight the island until it should forever lie lifeless as the frozen North."

Then, getting up to close a shutter that beat and banged against the house: "March! March! March! but the old South fellow will conquer, an' he heeds another night or so. But listen and ye'll hear his good wife warning him," said the old man sitting down again. She is saying, I ween,

"'The spring moon is only in its second quarter; it is not safe, great husband, to be sleeping yet.' But he'll only roar out 'Bah!' and bid her keep keen watch, and fall again to sleeping.

"At the end of the day, mind you, the wife for prudence sake 'll try once again (all good wives will) to rouse the sleeping keeper of the spring, pleading in her woman's way that the earth throbbing full of seeds and bulbs and insects' eggs and lively roots of mighty trees and greens and grasses must be watched over, for the enemy is treacherous and birds and fishes and all the little people of the woods are frail and can perish even in a night. 'Come, husband, let us together watch through one more spell, and by the full March moon a bounteous spring shall be prepared against the summer's coming.' Ye can nearly hear her pleading an' ye'll listen well, mi ladies," he added, enjoying hugely his own whimsical telling. "'To-morrow! to-morrow! to-morrow!' is all that the weary old ogre will say, and the patient dame goes about her duties troubled, lingering for a moment to smooth the cradle that stands fresh and ready for a baby giant that will be coming along with baby birds and squirrels and cats and bats and rabbits and bog-beetles in the young spring."

The Giant of the North Arrives

THEN because we insisted that he should go on and tell us more, the old man picked up a blackthorn stick and beat upon the hearth as you might scatter imaginary rats away from frightened children. "'Ho! ho! ho! ho! this is the night that I shall catch him napping, that sunbaked monster of the South! I'll buffet him to the warm wet sea, and you, great wife, shall break your fast on a south pond walrus.' 'Tis the Giant of the North," said the old man, apparently not a whit distressed at the din within or without.

Then, in one terrific instant, distant thunder and lightning and north wind rent the air, giant forests were laid low in that moment, and icebergs beat and crashed against the Causeway until the little village of Donegal seemed a toy town not worth the north wind's notice. But the old host continued the story.

"Can you not see the faithful South's wife stealing to his bedside swiftly, whispering, 'Husband, husband, waken quickly, the Giant of the North is here. There is no time to meet him squarely, and you are heavy with sleep, but climb into the cradle quickly and snore and roar and bluster in thy sleep.' And on that very instant in steps the Northland Giant, calling, 'Come forth, come forth, warm hobgoblin of the spring, and do me a puny battle for your gardens and warm weather.'

The South's Wife Answers

INDEED, bold sir, my good spouse is not in at present. It was so mild and close, he strolled out only in the last moment among the mountain tops to take a breath of this soft air that has sprung up so suddenly. 'Twas over warm in the bed, though the little one, as you see, sleeps quietly on in his cradle, unconcerned. Forbear to go too near him, gentle guest, for even giant babies will waken at a touch.' I most can hear her saying it," said the old story-teller, with a reassuring nod. "And now she pours for him a great cup which he drains at a single draught. 'I will pour another and another, most mild and gentle sir,' she adds. 'It is the baby's cup and holds but a thimble measure.'

"'An' is that the baby yonder, covered in the little bed? A monster infant 'tis indeed.'" And the old man's voice changed, as he fancied the giant's would have, had he been muttering these things to himself. "'He doth bellow in his sleep like a pack of mad seacows! What a curmudgeon indeed the sire must be!' And turning to the giant woman, whispers sheepishly, 'I am begging your pardon, my good woman. My own wife bade me stop in passing and inquire concerning thy little one.' Then with a score of ten-league leaps he cowered behind the horizon and tiptoed to the North.

"It will be a pleasant day to-morrow, ladies," the old host assured us, rising to bid us good-night, for the storm had spent itself.

"Finish the story," we cried breathless. "Oh, it is but a word to finish," he added, still standing in the attitude of bidding us good-night. "The Giant of the South and his brave wife merrily chuckled and laughed. And the spring came softly, promptly on, for there were no more winter storms, and the birds and warm south winds and rills all joined them in their mirth."

The Best Easter Story

AND very early in the morning they came unto the sepulcher bringing spices. . . . And behold, two men stood by them in shining garments, saying: "He is not here, but is risen."

And they drew nigh unto the village whither they went: and he made as though he would have gone farther. But they constrained him, saying, "Abide with us; for it is toward evening, and the day is far spent." . . . And it came to pass, as he sat at meat with them, he took bread, and blessed it, and brake, and gave to them. And their eyes were opened and they knew him.

Hindus Eager for the Gospel

GOD is doing great things in Ellore, South India. There is a spirit of inquiry among the heathen such as I have not seen for some time. A deputation of thirty-six heathen men recently arrived at the mission house to beg for a Christian teacher. They had walked nine miles for that purpose. The remarkable feature of the incident is that seven of the men were high-caste Hindus. During my thirty years in India, I have never before known the high and low-caste people of a village to unite in asking for the Gospel. There are signs in two villages of the caste people surrendering to Christ. The work among the caste girls in Ellore is encouraging.

Mr. W. C. Edwards Traveling on an Elephant Lent by the Rajah of Bhadrachellum

Last week we had the joy of baptizing seventy-nine heathen people, all converts from one village.

A friend from London, England (Mr. W. C. Edwards), has just visited us in Ellore. Our old friend, the Rajah of Bhadrachellum, kindly placed his elephant at our disposal, and Mr. Edwards was thus enabled to visit three of our Christian hamlets, where he rejoiced at what he saw of the Lord's work.

Last month we were able to open a small Bible training school for young men in Ellore—a long-felt need.

Mr. C. H. Billington writes me as follows: "I have sent a pastor and trained teacher to Kothapallie, the village from which the deputation of thirty-six men came. This afternoon nineteen men came from there, asking me to visit their village again on Sunday. This I have promised to do. So far the Lord has been pleased to deliver the village into our hands. The pastor seems to have a grip on the people, and I trust the Lord has, too. Yesterday, on special invitation, I visited a village containing about four hundred people. We gathered near the temple to Hanuman (the 'monkey god') and proclaimed Christ as Saviour. We had a large crowd, who listened attentively. These people are anxious to come out for Christ.

"There are two hamlets near, and the three villages contain no less than one thousand souls ready for the Gospel. What am I to do? Am I to step in and seize this grand opportunity? Surely the Spirit of the Lord is falling upon these poor people, and they are yielding to him."

I have wired Brother Billington the one word, "Take." We have exactly doubled our regular monthly expenditure during the last two months, though we have no funds to meet the increased expenditure involved in these extensions; but when the heathen are literally clamoring for the Gospel, what else could I do?

Will your readers pray that God may send us the needed means to enter these wide-open doors?

A. S. PAYNTER.

A California Mission

THE work of the Bethlehem Mission of Los Angeles, Calif., has steadily grown during the past fifteen years. It is conducted by the Rev. Dr. Dana Webster Bartlett. Connected with it there is a large free employment bureau; a bathhouse, patronized by over 30,000 last year; also a Japanese church of fifty members, a Japanese mission house, and a school of over fifty pupils. There is a club for Mexican women, sewing clubs for the Italian and Mexican girls, and clubs for Russian and Japanese boys. The organization is also endeavoring, under the leadership of Dr. Bartlett, to establish garden cities in the outlying districts of Los Angeles proper, for the poor foreigners of the city slums. Dr. Bartlett was also instrumental in founding the Sunrise Court of Los Angeles. Since the establishment of this court, no less than 2,000 men and women, who were arrested on the streets during the night, at break of day have been released on probation as first offenders, and returned to work. All arrested as first offenders are released on promise of better behavior. Surprising as it may seem, the number arrested a second time is less than one per cent. of the total. Letters like the following have been received by the magistrate of the Sunrise Court: "The Sunrise Court has saved my job, spared me the humiliation of a jail sentence and permitted me to return to my family, without a scene in courtroom or jail. I want to thank you deeply for the consideration shown me in this court and to express my gratefulness to the officials who had the wisdom to establish such a court to save first offenders. Rest assured my first appearance at the court will be my last."

"Gus" the Tailor

A Bowery Mission Trophy

IN THE tailor shop of the Bowery Mission Labor Settlement sits a quiet little man patiently plying his busy needle. He is all alone, except for the unseen spirits that "compass him about as a great cloud of witnesses," and which are as real to him as flesh and blood. He lives a great deal on the intangible border line that divides the seen from the unseen. He is one who has already "come out of great tribulation," and is calmly waiting for his crowning. This little four-square room, cluttered with cast-off clothing, in which he works, is but the vestibule of the Father's "house of many mansions," and it seems as though already the dawning light of the better day falls across his face as he looks up with a smile and hums the words of a beloved hymn he heard sung the night before in the Bowery Mission:

O house of many mansions,
Thy gates are opened wide,
And dear are all the faces
Upon the other side.

Seldom has the desolating hurricane of sorrow swept through a human life with such swift and sudden vehemence and such stunning, staggering force as that which struck the life of Gus Voght on June 14, 1904. It was on that fatal day that the steamer General Slocum, with hundreds of Sunday School scholars, teachers and parents on board, bent on a day's enjoyment, flashed out in flame on the East River, and, before any help could be secured, had carried scores to a ghastly death. Among the victims were the wife and two children of the little tailor. He was a poor man. His home was humble indeed, but it was everything to him. It was the scene of a daily struggle for existence, in which he and his patient wife did superhuman things and suffered dire privations in order that the two children might enjoy a somewhat better lot than theirs had been. By dint of great effort it had been made possible for the mother and two little girls to have this outing. It had been looked forward to with eager delight by the children, and, in gay and exulting excitement, they had bidden their father good-by as he started for his day's work, whilst they wended their way to the fated steamer.

The mother and the younger child were never seen again. The elder daughter had leaped from the burning steamer upon a tugboat, and was apparently safe—for a moment. A panic-stricken man, however, essayed the same feat, and also jumped. In cruel misfortune he came crashing down on the child and immediately killed her.

Thus at one blow had the life of the little man been utterly blighted. For a time reason tottered on her throne. The shock brought on bodily paralysis, permanently disabling his left arm and affecting his speech. For a year he was unable to work, and ultimately drifted to that haven of so many helpless human derelicts, the Bowery Mission.

There were other pathetic events associated with the coming of Gus to the Mission.

One Sunday morning in the fall of 1906 I received a hurried call from one of the near-by lodging-houses. A man in whom I had been for some time deeply interested had died suddenly. His room-mates heard him utter one wild, piercing shriek, and by the time they reached his side he was dead. It was a sad, sad ending of what might have been a brilliant career. During the previous summer I had visited the home of his parents in London, England, a home of elegance and luxury. He was a favorite son, but for many years had been a wanderer. Both parents were over eighty, and, with copious tears and in tremulous tones, they had begged me to use my influence to get him to return home. Alas, alas,

Charles D Sigsbee, Rear-Admiral U S Navy writes:

After a thorough trial of Sanatogen I am convinced of its merits as a food and tonic. Its beneficial effects are beyond doubt."

Lady Henry Somerset, the prominent social reformer advocate, writes:

"Sanatogen emboldened to stores sleep, invigorates the nerves and braces the patient to health. I have watched its effect on people whose nervous systems have been entirely unstrung and I have proved Sanatogen to be most valuable."

The Most Reverend, the Archbishop of Bombay, writes:

"I use Sanatogen every now and then, under my doctor's advice, and always derive great benefit from it."

The Right Honorable Sir John Gorst, the eminent Statesman and former member of the British Cabinet, writes that he "wishes to say he has only been acquainted with the great merits of Sanatogen—has taken it with excellent results, and when necessary will certainly take it again. It was also used by a daughter of his with great benefit."

Such Praise for Sanatogen Means that it Would Help My Nerves

When your nerves are calling for help—the one conclusive argument in favor of any means of aid is the experience of others.

The experience of others has made plain the danger of quick stimulants and the danger of mere experiment.

But when 15,000 practising physicians and many thousands of other men and women, including eminent representatives of the great professions, testify to personal test of Sanatogen, the food tonic, and to its direct and specific help in restoring the health of the nerves, you have the best possible reason for believing that Sanatogen will help your nerves.

Sanatogen is a scientific adaptation to the real needs of a starved nervous system.

Purest albumen organically combined with sodium glycerophosphate, to make a product that is eagerly absorbed by the weakest stomach and quickly carried to the starved cells, there to perform its splendid reconstructive, vitalizing effect.

In a word Sanatogen restores to the nerves that which has been drained from them by illness, worry or over-activity—it nourishes and replenishes the very sources of their strength.

Whether you have met but the first signs of nervous derangement, or have suffered long through the trying ordeals of sleeplessness, poor digestion, "low spirits" and general inefficiency, Sanatogen is the natural help you need.

"Such praise" is your highest assurance of aid to new health.

"Gus" the Tailor

the prodigal preferred the wilderness and the husks to the father's house. No amount of persuasion that I could bring to bear upon him sufficed to wean him from the misery of the Bowery, and the end quickly came.

Knowing that his people would wish him to have a decent Christian burial, arrangements were quickly made, and from our platform I gave an invitation to any one who had known him to attend the service in the undertaker's chapel.

Funeral services are generally scenes of tragic sorrow, but for dumb, unspeakable pathos there have probably been few like that. My heart was strangely stirred, my voice was shaken, and my eyes were filled with tears as I went through the simple service. Besides "Mother" Bird, my wife and one or two of my co-workers, only one man had accepted the invitation to be present. He was the only mourner. He sat with bowed head and quivering jaw, contending all the time with the inward surgings of an overpowering emotion. As the last words of the committal were uttered he rose unbidden, and kneeling by the casket of his departed friend, he said: "From to-day I'm going to live a Christian life." It was "Gus," the tailor.

Right faithfully has he kept his vow. He became one of us. His sweet, simple good nature won our hearts. He has been with us ever since, and a short time after his conversion he made another fact known which reveals Gus Voght as the "Andrew" who brought a great "Peter" to Christ and the Bowery Mission.

The story of the conversion of Victor Benke, the famous Tramp Organist of the Bowery, is one of our choicest classics. How often, as Benke used to relate the event, and as we heard other eye-witnesses relate it, did we long to find the man who, on that memorable Sunday morning, had found the miserable young German hobo in one of the city parks, and had brought him to "Mother" Bird's meeting and salvation! Benke himself had tried unceasingly to find him but had failed. Now the mystery was solved. It was little "Gus," the tailor.

Benke passed away a few days after the Slocum disaster and joined the other "spirits made perfect." To "Gus," as he sits in the tailor shop, it is the memory of the fact that he was instrumental in bringing this sweet singer of Israel to Christ that so soothingly stirs within his mind, and it is the feeling that he will soon join him and the other loved ones gone on before, that makes his heart glad as he quietly sings,

O house of many mansions,
Thy gates are opened wide,
And dear are all the faces
Upon the other side.

Walls May Be Plain or Paneled

Compo-Board Walls and Ceilings have a smooth non-porous surface that may be stenciled, decorated in oil or water colors, or papered. Or you can have pretty paneled walls and beamed ceilings.

You can make your home a "home beautiful" at small cost by simply nailing Compo-Board onto the old plaster. There will be no dirt or muss to clean up, and it will take much less time and annoyance than a replastering job, cost less, and last much longer.

Compo-Board is practical as well as artistic. It is made of five of the best air tight, moisture proof materials, pressed into a stiff, strong, durable sheet one-fourth inch thick, under terrific pressure and intense heat. It can not warp, is not affected by dampness, and cold or heat can't get through. It keeps your rooms comfortable in winter and summer. It will wear longer than the building, and the bangs and knocks it gets from furniture will not even dent it.

Compo-Board is sold by dealers in most every town. It can be bought in sheets four feet wide and length in even feet up to eighteen feet. Write us if you can't find a dealer in your town.

Send for our illustrated booklet and samples. The booklet will tell you of some of the many uses for Compo-Board; the sample will give you an idea of what it is. Write to-day.

Questions and Answers

J. M. A., Florida. Who was Rachel weeping for? Her children? (Matt. 2: 18.) I do not find her name in my Bible dictionary.

The passage referred to relates to the Babylonian captivity. Rachel, the wife of Jacob, and mother of Joseph and Benjamin, is figuratively represented as rising from the tomb and lamenting over the loss of her children. Ramah in Benjamin was a scene of pillage and massacre in Jeremiah's time (see Jer. 31: 15), and hence is chosen by the prophet in his figurative scene of lamentation.

J. I. B., Milwaukee, Wis. To what extent are we justified in claiming that the influence of Christian America made itself felt in China's struggle for emancipation?

American education and religious training have unquestionably influenced the Chinese people to a considerable extent. Young Chinese, coming here and being trained in our schools and colleges, coming constantly under the influence of Christian doctrine and imbibing a love of American freedom and independence, return to their own land earnest advocates of change. Sun Yat Sen, the first provisional president, is a Christian and united with the Episcopal Church. Chu Chan, one of his chief advisers, is also a Christian. General Li Hung, vice-president, is represented as an earnest evangelical Christian. Dr. Wu Ting Fang, a member of his cabinet, was baptized a Christian, and Liang Chi Cho, another revolutionary leader, was educated by our missionaries and is an earnest Christian and a good speaker. How far Christianity may be represented in the cabinet of the new president, Yuan Shi Kai, is not yet apparent.

Mrs. B. E. B., McAdam, B. C., Canada. Where in the New Testament can I find three places where the Father spoke to Jesus, saying, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," or "This is my beloved Son: hear him"? I have found several passages, but they all relate to the baptism and to the transfiguration.

The passages relating to the baptism are: Matt. 3: 17; Mark 1: 11; Luke 3: 21, 22; to the transfiguration: Matt. 17: 5; Mark 9: 7; Luke 9: 35. Other passages which express substantially the same idea are: Matt. 12: 18; Luke 20: 13; II. Pet. 1: 17.

H. R. W., Lawrence, N. Y. 1. What is your candid opinion of the recent demonstration in honor of Cardinal Farley? 2. Is it right for our city officials to permit such a religious procession in his honor? 3. Is it right to permit the carrying of the Papal flag even though it is accompanied by the Stars and Stripes?

1. Our opinion of the event has been already expressed in the article on "A Prince of the Papacy," which appeared in our issue of January 31. 2. Under our government, religious equality and freedom of worship are granted to all. 3. This is a Christian country, and while the nation, as a whole, is liberal, it cannot view such demonstrations without apprehension. With regard to your other questions, we would say that the very fact that Americans are educated in the principles of religious freedom and equality is the best guaranty against Papal schemes. The whole history of Catholic domination in older lands is a sad one. The Church of Rome has lost its hold in almost every country in Europe. It has always been the enemy of education and human progress, and wherever the masses have become enlightened, its power has declined. England, France, Italy, Portugal have successively shaken off Papal authority and Spain may yet do so. In South America, its influence has been against education and human progress and it is now waning even there. Any concerted effort looking toward Catholic ascendancy here would be opposed by our people and could never hope to succeed.

C. P., Babylon, N. Y. In your issue of February 14, the question is asked: "Who are the 'witnesses' spoken of in Heb. 12: 1?" In answer the writer says the image implied is a race in the arena. There is nothing which would give us grounds for thinking that Paul had any such idea. The latter part of the article is the true meaning of the text. Everything is spiritual—spiritual witnesses of a spiritual race. Paul does, however, draw the comparison in I. Cor. 9: 24, 25. The closing of Heb. 11 and opening of Heb. 12 is in my estimation one of the most blessed and sacred passages in God's Word. It gives us the assurance that we shall meet those who have gone before us. "Without us they shall not be made perfect."

Paul, in the passage in Heb. 12: 1, was likening the spiritual life to a race, and he used the terms of the arena in describing it, which were quite appropriate. It was a true similitude and is so regarded by commentators generally. As our correspondent observes, however, the whole passage is purely spiritual, and we should look beyond the mere material figure and endeavor to grasp the higher meaning. There is no more comforting and reassuring passage in any of the epistles than this, which shows the conviction that the "witnesses"—those saints who have passed over before us—are watching us with a lively interest and helping us with their unseen presence and spiritual sympathy in our battle here.

H. A. B., Clayton, O. Please explain James 5: 14, 15. Is it practiced to-day? W. W., Wissington Springs, S. D., also asks: Can you give the address of any parties or denomination that practice divine healing?

The most recent "divine healing" movement is that known as the "Emmanuel Movement," under the direction of Dr. Elwood Worcester and Dr. Samuel McComb, of Boston; Dr. J. B. Faucon, rector of St. Mary's, New York; Dr. L. W. Batten, of the Episcopal General Seminary at New York, and other Episcopal clergymen. The Christian Alliance has a long record of cases of positive healing in answer to prayer. Anointing with oil is often practiced by their workers. Aside from these specific movements many individual ministers and Christian workers give attention to faith healing, and humble Christians everywhere are constantly experiencing the power of God to relieve pain and remove sickness in answer to prayer.

Mrs. W. C. L., Madison, Conn. The author of the lines,

"Give to the world the best you have
And the best will come back to you"

is Madeline Bridges.

G. P., Valencia, Kan., writes: "The number of your paper giving the views of so many bright women of our country about the 'obey' in the marriage ceremony was very fascinating to me. So many of them are aged mothers. They remind me of the poet Holmes, who said: "Old people are like some of our fruits, as the peach and the pear, all the sweeter just before decay." When I read what they had to say I felt like tossing my hat up in the air. I was an orphan boy when I enlisted in the Civil War. I sacrificed an arm and suffered many other things common to a soldier's life and never regretted it. It was done for a people I love and I expect to nourish such feeling until this gray head of mine is pillowed in my coffin."

SHE QUIT COFFEE

And Much Good Came From It.

It is hard to believe that coffee will put a person in such a condition as it did a woman of Apple Creek, O. She tells her own story:

"I did not believe coffee caused my trouble, and frequently said I liked it so well I would not quit drinking it, even if it took my life, but I was a miserable sufferer from heart trouble and nervous prostration for four years.

"I was scarcely able to be around at all. Had no energy and did not care for anything. Was emaciated and had a constant pain around my heart until I thought I could not endure it. I felt as though I was liable to die any time.

"Frequently I had nervous chills and the least excitement would drive sleep away, and any little noise would upset me terribly. I was gradually getting worse until finally, one day, it came over me and I asked myself what is the use of being sick all the time and buying medicine so that I could indulge myself in coffee?

"So I thought I would see if I could quit drinking coffee, and got some Postum to help me quit. I made it strictly according to directions and I want to tell you that change was the greatest step in my life. It was easy to quit coffee because I had the Postum which I like better than I liked the old coffee. One by one the old troubles left, until now I am in splendid health, nerves steady, heart all right and the pain all gone. Never have any more nervous chills, don't take any medicine, can do all my housework and have done a great deal besides.

"My sister-in-law, who visited me this summer, had been an invalid for some time, much as I was. I got her to quit coffee and drink Postum. She gained five pounds in three weeks, and I never saw such a change in anyone's health."

"There's a reason."

THE MASTER'S ORDER

I SAY it over and over, and yet again to-day,
It rests my heart as surely as it did yesterday,
It is the Lord's appointment,
Whatever my work may be,
I am sure in my heart of hearts
He has offered it to me.

I must say it over and over, and again to-day,
For my work is different from that of yesterday,
It is the Lord's appointment,
It quiets my restless will
Like the voice of tender mother,
And my heart and will are still.

I will say it over and over, this, and every day,
Whatsoever the Master orders, come what may,
It is the Lord's appointment,
For only his love can see
What is wisest, best, and right,
What is truly good for me. —Selected.

J. A. D., Galovin, Alaska. In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD it is stated that Paul was familiar with the Greek version of the Scripture. I infer that when you say "Scripture" you mean both Old and New Testaments.

It is made manifest in Acts 27 that Paul was familiar with "all the learning of the Greeks." Tarsus, his native city, was a famous seat of learning and philosophical research, and he probably had the advantage of training in its schools. The son of a Pharisee and trained from boyhood to the pursuits of a doctor of Jewish law, he presumably was instructed in the elements of Rabbinical lore, including of course the Jewish Scriptures. These are the inferences of those writers who have studied his life career. This could not apply to the New Testament writings as we now know them, for they were only in the making, and must have been very incomplete; but it is a fair presumption that in his later career, as an apostle, he was not ignorant of such writings as may then have been in existence, dealing with the events of Jesus' life and ministry. There was no New Testament, in the modern meaning of the term, in Paul's day, and could not have been, for obvious reasons.

M. B., Decatur, Ia. There are many fads and harmless eccentricities permissible to feminine taste, but a pair of dancing slippers, the heels of which were studded with diamonds and worn by an American woman at a party in London recently, seems to me a wilful and sinful bit of extravagance. It is very much in line with the vulgar braggadocio of a parvenu of whom it is related that he lighted his cigarette and those of his friends with crisp, new bank-notes.

There are prodigal daughters as well as prodigal sons, and their sins of extravagance and vanity are alike reprehensible. Instances of the character mentioned by M. B. are fortunately rare, and can only be explained as the result of a mania for notoriety. Such doings are the index of a weak mind and a conscience unawakened to moral duties and responsibilities.

Mrs. W. W. Naples, Fla. 1. Is Veronica mentioned in the Bible? 2. What does Rev. 22: 2 mean?

1. Veronica was a pious woman of Jerusalem, the story of whose kindness to the Saviour when he was being taken to crucifixion has been preserved in tradition. She is not mentioned by name in the Gospels. She is supposed to have been the woman mentioned in Matt. 9: 20. 2. The whole description is figurative. The waters in the New Testament represent Gospel glory, flowing from God, the fountain of life. Whereas now each season has its fruits, there it will be one perpetual, neverending season of productiveness, twelve indicating endless variety. The leaves of the tree are for the "health-giving" (not "healing") of the nations—those who long before (in the millennium) had become the Lord's people. Regarding your last question, we would suggest that you communicate with the post office authorities, Washington, D. C., if you cannot find satisfaction locally.

Miscellaneous

C. H. F., Doster, Mich. See parallel passage in Luke 12: 53. This was recently explained in THE MAIL-BAG, February 7, page 141.

R. P., Pennsylvania. The temple was built on Mount Moriah, the site which was purchased by David from Araunah the Jebusite. See II. Chron. 3: 1.

Z. J. K., Hillsville, Va. Rev. 7: 1 has no reference to the rotundity of the earth. The "four corners" might with equal accuracy be interpreted "four quarters."

J. G. "Immortal" and "everlasting" are interchangeable terms. Theologically, they mean continued and endless conscious existence, in union with God.

Any subscriber of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who may know the address of Charles Stoddard, who was last heard from while living in South Dakota, will confer a favor by forwarding that information to Miss M. J. Gunn, R. R. No. 24, Box 120, Delta, O.

H. E. P., Whitten, Ia. 1. Your question hinges on the meaning of the word "paradise," which expresses the future state of bliss, both in its higher and lower stages (see II. Cor. 12: 2, 4). In the passage in Luke 22 reference is made not to the highest or final stage, but to the state of the disembodied spirit immediately after death. It was not the ultimate state, but a condition of rest and peace. 2. Matt. 24: 34 has already been discussed in THE MAIL-BAG of February 7, page 141.

J. S., Letterkenny, County Donegal, Ireland, writes: "In THE MAIL-BAG of February 14 the question is asked: 'What has become of the souls of the heathen who died without the knowledge of the true God?' (See I. Pet. 4: 6. Also I. Pet. 3: 19.) It will not do, as some commentators say, to state that Noah was the preacher. He had no Gospel to preach. He was a preacher of righteousness (justice and judgment). They shall be judged on the same principle as those who heard the Gospel when in the flesh. This, of course, applies to all the heathen before the Gospel dispensation."

HOW JESUS WOULD KEEP THE SABBATH*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

IT IS fitting that a lesson on Sabbath observance should follow Easter, for one reason: because "the Lord's Day is the little Easter," the weekly celebration of the resurrection of Christ. Another good reason is that to-day begins "World's Week of Prayer for the Sabbath," which is appointed at this season for what constitutes a third strong reason for studying Sabbath observance, at this time, namely, that the opening of spring is the very time to head off summer Sabbath-breaking. Let teachers' meetings vote that they will not patronize for picnics on any day those resorts that break the laws of God and man by Sunday amusements. Especially let the boys and girls be convinced, before Sunday amusements come in like a flood, that God's plan (Isa. 58: 13, 14), that we should on the Sabbath "turn away" from selfish work and selfish "pleasure" to the higher "delight" of altruism, tends to individual as well as social welfare.

It would not be the best use of the teachers' precious half-hour to discuss in detail the too strict observance of the Sabbath by the Pharisees of twenty centuries ago. It would probably do more harm than good by making a boy think his father and pastor were Pharisees because they objected to Sunday games. There is no danger of any one keeping the Sabbath too strictly in our times. It is the modern Sadducees we need to get after, who think the Sabbath and all other days were made for selfish gain and selfish pleasure. The Pharisees were like many of our day in that their ideal of Sabbath-keeping was mostly negative—doing nothing, or as little as possible. The man who spends the Sabbath mostly in sluggish sleep and "gregarious chattering" and reading such inanities as those of the Sunday supplements, needs, no less than the Pharisees, to learn from Jesus that true Sabbath-keeping is not doing nothing, but doing good.

Let us look straight into the text of the lesson and other stories of how Jesus himself kept the Sabbath, that we may apply to our own Sunday problems the great test, "What would Jesus do?"

Jesus defended and defined "works of necessity" on the Sabbath when he showed that watering an ox, or rescuing him from a pit (Luke 13: 15), or getting a Sunday dinner of cracked wheat (Matt. 12: 1-8), were in harmony with God's law. In eight Sabbaths of his earthly life, in eight different sections of Palestine, he healed the sick for the express purpose of showing that such brotherly kindness is the very best Sabbath-keeping. As farmers rest their fields by change of crops, not by leaving the soil idle to the weeds, so the true rest for fertile minds—which will think and plan on secular things unless the displacing power of a new affection, a new enthusiasm, a new occupation, turns the thoughts into a new channel—is a radical change of activities, such as works of mercy bring after six days' work for money. Christ's example teaches us that idleness as well as business is Sabbath-breaking. True Sabbath-keeping requires such activities as visiting the poor and sick and sinful, such work as Christian instruction in the home and Sabbath school. "It is lawful to do good on the Sabbath day." It is unlawful to spend it wholly in idleness. The Sabbath has been too much a day of don'ts. Bad activities may be most easily displaced by good ones. Constantine, in his second edict about Sunday observance, applies Christ's Sabbath teachings most admirably when he says of the sacred day: "It is most grateful and pleasing that those things should be done on it that are most desirable. Therefore it is our pleasure that all our ministers have leave to emancipate and manumit on that holy day, and enter all such acts as concern the same." Christ loosed on the Sabbath those bound with infirmities; Constantine made it a weekly emancipation day; so should Christians of to-day use it to relieve the body and soul by works of mercy.

We ought to read with the stories of how Jesus kept the Sabbath on earth, the story in the first chapter of Revelation of how he was seen on a Lord's day in heaven, not sitting idly, but standing and girded, telling the apostle John to write seven letters to make seven cities better. Surely doing good by letter-writing is a form of Sabbath observance within reach of all except those too young to write. It is not fitting to spend the Sabbath in writing letters of gain or of gossip, but let us read on Sabbath morning some of the beautiful personal letters that were counted good enough to be made a part of the Bible (I. and II. Timothy, Titus, Philemon, II. and III. John), and learn from them to write in a fashion that will help to make better the world we live in.

The Imperiled Sabbath

Let us face the fact that the Sabbath is now more attacked and less defended in the United States than ever before. The Sunday laws still remain, indeed, on the statute books, except in California and the District of Columbia. Only in a few cases have the laws legalized Sunday trains, Sunday papers or Sunday sports and shows. But the Sunday laws, like those against many other evil things, are often unenforced. The people, in many places, share the guilt of supine and unworthy officials, by rewarding them with re-election. It is not alone the saloons that try to claim for the worst form of business an extra day, but those public performances and shows which are only too apt to be accompanied by influences that lead to vice and crime are allowed to draw thoughtless youth from church and Sunday School. Sunday base ball is a still more serious attack on the American Sabbath. The games go on just about the same whether the legislature forbids or permits the sport, and the crowd that spends Sunday "rooting" is brutalizing the better class of youth who are drawn into this great temptation.

No one should settle the question whether he shall spend Sunday in sport by any such petty test as, "It does not particularly hurt me to go to a Sunday ball game once or twice." The test is, What has been the effect of Sunday sports on nations? Hallam, the great philosopher of history, says that "shrewd despots have cultivated a love of Sunday pastimes to keep the people quiet under political distresses." Bob Burdette says: "The Declaration of Independence was not written in a beer dive on Sunday afternoon. Not by a jugful." It is a patriotic duty to be loyal to the American Sabbath.

What Can I Do?

That even an individual of only average talent and average opportunity can materially help in the restoration of the American Sabbath is shown by the simple yet wonderful story of Mr. Ernest A. Eggers, a Brooklyn letter-carrier, who is just about such a fellow as any letter-carrier you see on the street, only that his name and nature is "Ernest." In church, one Sunday morning, he heard an address of Rev. O. R. Miller, who had long worked for the prohibition of Sunday labor in post offices. Of these efforts Mr. Miller spoke—only one of many topics discussed—and Mr. Eggers at once determined to work for Sunday closing, for the sake of his own body and soul and for his fellows. His pastor, Rev. G. W. Osmun, encouraged him. The superintendent of the International Reform Bureau put him in touch with Rev. Geo. W. Grannis, D.D., of the National Lord's Day Alliance. Rev. J. P. Hutchinson gave him great cheer by getting the Colorado Springs office closed. The humble letter-carrier used his leisure hours diligently in letter-writing and interviews until he had secured another Sunday closing law in Toledo, through Rev. E. W. Berger. Then the postmaster of New York, Mr. E. M. Morgan, was induced to give his powerful aid, and Assistant Postmaster-General Grandfield and Postmaster-General Hitchcock found enough public sentiment had been aroused, mainly by the wise use of that one letter-carrier's leisure hours, for them to issue orders in rapid succession discontinuing Sunday delivery of mail in ninety per cent. of the post offices. The next step is to ask for a law to forbid Sunday work in the money order and registry divisions of post offices; and for another law to relieve those who gather mail from boxes on Sunday from that burden, which both Toronto and London prove to be needless.

Sunday School Lesson

If we watch out, we shall find many ways to give back Sunday as a rest day and home day and weekly independence day and character-building day to some of those who have been robbed of it.

How a Child's Gift Grew

A LITTLE girl once came to a small Sunday School and asked to be taken in, but the attendance was already too large to be comfortably accommodated, and it was explained that there was no room for her. Within less than two years little Hattie May Wiatt, aged eight, fell ill and the pastor of the same little church came to see her; the doctor came, too, but she slipped away on her own little last pilgrimage and no one guessed her strange little girl secret until beneath her pillow was found a battered and torn pocketbook with fifty-seven pennies in it wrapped about with a little scrap of paper upon which was written "To help build the little Temple bigger, so that more children can go there to Sunday School." Hattie was a poor little girl, and for two years she had worked for and saved her pennies for the cause which was nearest her heart. The pastor told the touching incident to his congregation and people began making donations for the enlargement of the little church. The papers got hold of the story and told it far and wide until, within five years, those fifty-seven pennies had grown to be $250,000, and to-day if you go to Philadelphia, you can see a great church there called the Baptist Temple, with a seating capacity of eight thousand people, a Temple College where over fourteen hundred students are accommodated, a Temple Hospital with an enormous capacity, and a Temple Sunday School building so large that all the children who want to attend may come and be comfortable there. She was only a little girl with a little girl's heart, but who can estimate the power of her ardor, her unselfishness and her fifty-seven pennies?

The Howard Watch

THE U. S. Postal Mail Service is the backbone of the rapid delivery of letters in this country.

The Mail Trains are veritable "post-offices on wheels."

They collect mail from practically every post-office in the United States—and they sort this mail while traveling on express schedule —HOWARD time.

The whole American business system is built up on the saving of minutes.

The man who is unsuccessful is very likely one who is never sure what's o'clock.

It is the difference in temperament—in habit of mind—and in watches.

Now and for all, the HOWARD is the watch for the man whose time means money.

It is admittedly the finest practical watch in the world—made and adjusted to standards that have never been attained by any other timepiece.

A HOWARD Watch is always worth what you pay for it.

The price of each watch is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel (double roller) in a Crescent Extra or Boss Extra gold-filled case at $40, to the 23-jewel at $150—and the EDWARD HOWARD model at $350.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD Watch. Find the HOWARD jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know.

Admiral Sigsbee has written a little book, "The Log of the HOWARD Watch," giving the record of his own HOWARD in the U. S. Navy. You'll enjoy it. Drop us a post-card, Dept. W, and we'll send you a copy.

RABBONI

"Jesus saith unto her, 'Mary.' She turned herself, and saith unto him, 'Rabboni!' which is to say, Master." (St. John 20: 16.)

I DID not know Him, so sad that night,
The dawn so far away;
But I had gone to do the deeds I might—
Embalm Him, and to pray.

My Christ! My King beloved! Ah, but dead!
I brought sweet spices there;
My heart was broken—all uncomforted;
I poured it out in prayer.

I did not know that He had risen then,
For e'er to me restored;
He spake to me—He called my name again!
My Master—and my Lord!

Easter in the Holy Land

PALESTINE is now being crossed and recrossed in every direction by hundreds and thousands of Christian pilgrims from all over the civilized world. The city of Jerusalem is extended for miles by large colonies of pilgrims from different countries. Temporary hospices and shelters for travelers are built and stores for selling provisions, relics and souvenirs during Easter Week. An endless stream of peaceful invaders makes its way to the chapel of the Holy Sepulcher from daylight to midnight on Easter Day. Throughout the church pilgrims kneel, kissing "The Stone of Unction," upon which it is believed the body of Christ was laid before being laid in the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea. From Jerusalem the pilgrims scatter in caravans large and small to all parts of Palestine, visiting as many shrines as they can reach, and drinking at every historic fountain. The devout pilgrims form an almost unbroken line from Jerusalem to Jericho during the week following Easter.

BOYS'

PARENTS

Have you found an outlet for that excessive supply of energy that is accumulating within that boy of yours, for which you have racked your brains? The normal lad of from seven to fifteen years of age has usually twice the amount of energy he can consume in play and study. Outdoor play lacks the important factor—incentive, and the resulting good is merely spasmodic.

A definite pursuit of an hour a day or several hours each week with an incentive; some activity that will keep him in the open and at the same time off the street corners; an occupation that will exercise his mind and body, that will make him bright and alert, and teach him that which is so often lacking in the ordinary public schools, and which is so necessary to his future—the fundamental principles of business; this is exactly what your boy needs.

Allow him to start a little business of his own with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in your own neighborhood in his spare time. We will help him. You can help him. Salesmanship, the value of money, a definite aim in life, perseverance, punctuality, politeness and neatness are a few of the lessons he will learn in this best school—the school of actual experience.

We will furnish plenty of incentive. Each month a Shetland Pony with cart and harness complete is given as a reward of merit to the best boy. Watches and other premiums too numerous to mention are additional rewards.

Let him try. You know he will make good. We know he will make good, as our several thousand other boys are doing. Allow him to fill in the below coupon and mail it

Welch's

The National Drink
Grape Juice

It is the ideal natural beverage. It may be served as it is or used as the foundation for many temptingly delicious drinks.

A case of WELCH'S in the house means that you are prepared for any social occasion. Welch grape punch, Welch grape sherbet—any of the many delightful drinks and dainty desserts made with WELCH'S can be produced in a few moments.

WELCH'S is, when you open the bottle, the very juice that was in the grapes when they left the vines. Within a few hours after they were gathered—as we chose them—we washed, rinsed, stemmed and pressed them. The juice was at once hermetically sealed in glass by our process; its quality and flavor have not changed. We took nothing out of it—we put nothing in to change its taste, color or keeping quality.

Two Welch Hints

Put a tablespoonful of WELCH'S in the heart of your grapefruit at breakfast. Use WELCH'S instead of brandy in your mince pies—you'll be delighted by the luscious flavor.

Make a Welch Grape Punch

Take juice of three lemons and one orange; small cup of sugar; one pint of WELCH'S; one quart plain or charged water. Serve very cold. Add sliced fruits, if in punch bowl.

Do more than ask for "grape juice"—ask for Welch's—and get it.

Write today for our free booklet of Welch Grape Juice recipes—it solves many a problem of what beverage or dessert to have.

If unable to get WELCH'S of your dealer we will send a trial dozen pints for $3 express prepaid east of Omaha. Four-ounce bottle by mail, 10 cents.

TWO IMPATIENT GUESTS

From the Original Painting by Anton Dieffenbach

Caught!

—eating the food that is good for them, the food that makes strong bones, firm muscles, clear brains.

This "really true" incident was prompted by the memory of those

SNIDER Process PORK & BEANS

that were "oh-so-good" at dinner time

AND they are better every time you eat 'em," say the boys and girls.

Children like Snider Process Pork & Beans because these beans are good for the children. That is nature. A child with a normally healthy stomach will crave the things that are healthful for it and refuse the things that are hurtful.

Do children crave Snider's Beans? Well, now, just open a can of them, with the children standing around, and see for yourself.

Snider's Beans make the children want to study, they make them learn their lessons more easily and when the lessons are done, Snider's Beans make those children want to play in the open air until they have the rosy cheek and the "twinkle eye" that it does one's soul good to see.

The secret? Why, Snider's Beans are energy builders—tissue builders. Beans are just "nuggets of nutriment,"—and the nutrition of beans is largely protein, the food element that makes good bones, strong muscles, firm flesh and clear brains.

Snider's Beans are prepared and cooked in such a way that they are more tender and digestible than other beans. Snider's are so porous—made so by the Snider Process—that the digestive juices can reach and dissolve every particle. Thus all the goodness is used up for the body's benefit, with the least possible digestive effort.

That's enough to make every mother buy Snider's for her family. But there is still another reason; Snider's do not produce "flatulence"—"wind on the stomach." There is no discomfort after eating these carefully prepared, delicious beans, made perfect by a luscious bit of pork jowl and the sauce that everyone likes so much. This sauce is made from Snider's Tomato Catsup, the one table relish preferred by everyone that has ever tasted it.

Over 27 years of scientific study and practice have been devoted to making Snider's Pork & Beans the best possible—just the very food that boys and girls and all the family should eat.

They look delicious, whole, yet mellow and tender; they taste delicious, more so every time they are served.

Keep Snider's Tomato Catsup on the table and in the pantry, as a relish for meats, hot or cold, all fish, oysters, and as the foundation and seasoning of soups, gravies and hot tomato sauce. Use Snider's Chili Sauce upon meats.

TRY THIS TEST. Buy a can of Snider's Pork and Beans. If you do not honestly think them the best beans you ever tasted, return the empty can to your Grocer and we will refund your money.

The "Awni-Allah" as the Italians Left Her

The Wrecked Bank of Salonica

The Wreck of the "Angora" in Beirut Harbor

Europe's Turco-Italian Tangle

AFTER months of apparent listless watching, the nations of Europe were suddenly awakened to the possibility of there being a serious international aspect to the Turco-Italian War by the bombardment of Beirut, which has already been described in these pages. Italy's extension of the theater of war from Tripoli to the Syrian coast and the Red Sea has caused Europe to bestir herself and consider ways and means of putting a stop to a proceeding that is at any moment likely to affect her most vital spot—her pocketbook.

A few weeks ago the nations stood almost evenly divided in sentiment, but to-day Russia alone is frankly on the side of Italy. Russia is believed to have made one silent attempt to bring about peace in addition to the note which, in February, she addressed to the Powers, urging the various governments to force a settlement of the difficulties on the basis of "Tripoli for Italy, and an indemnity for Turkey." In France the feeling has become almost entirely anti-Italian. Germany and Austria seem ready to make any sacrifice for their ally except to embroil themselves with Turkey on her behalf. England remains solemnly silent, but it is an open secret that she will act only with a majority of the Continental Powers.

In the meantime, Italy seems to be thoroughly enjoying herself. The people are as determined as ever to prosecute the war to a successful finish. The passing by the parliament on February 24 of the bill which officially annexed Tripoli and Cyrenaica was acclaimed with unbounded enthusiasm by all classes of the population. The attempt which was made by a young anarchist, Antonio Dalba, on March 14 to assassinate King Victor Emmanuel as he was driving to a memorial service aroused the deepest feeling throughout the entire country, and the most remarkable outburst of loyalty that Italy has ever seen was the tangible result. Military glory has thrown its glamour over Italy, and the national head seems to have been a bit turned by this the united nation's first success. When one of the senators states in a Roman newspaper: "The north of Africa has always been Roman," he epitomizes the bombast of the whole country. In homely American phraseology it might be said that Italy is "feeling her oats" just a bit.

The newspapers of Europe reflect the sentiments of the people when they speak as if "Italy were a child who had found a matchbox and would set everything on fire." There is certainly every evidence that she has no intention of making peace on any other terms than those outlined by Russia. The bombardment of Beirut that set all Europe's tongues a-wagging was a confessed move on Italy's part to force home on the government of the Sublime Porte the conviction that they may not sit peacefully at home, leaving their marooned soldiers and a few Arabs to carry on a guerrilla warfare in Tripoli for years to come.

General Caneva, the Italian commander in Tripoli, was recalled to Rome a few weeks ago to inform the cabinet whether or not it would be possible with the means at his disposal, or with the addition of what reinforcements could be sent him from Italy, to "provide that unequivocal and decisive victory of which Italy is in need, if it were to impose an unconditional peace upon Turkey." The general announced that he could guarantee the slow but thoroughly effective conquest of Tripoli, but said that for a "brilliant success, you must seek elsewhere than in Libya." The naval operations which have been taking place in the eastern end of the Mediterranean and the Red Seas are generally considered to be the result of the policies determined upon in pursuance of General Caneva's advice.

In spite of the assurance which Admiral Faravelli cabled from Beirut that the city had not been bombarded, and that only the gunboats in the harbor had been destroyed, all Europe has been much excited by the photographic evidence which has come forward to prove that the city certainly did not escape without considerable damage. The Bank of Salonica was badly damaged by a shell, having a great hole rent straight through its walls. In a near-by street fifteen people were killed by a stray shell, and a great mass of wreckage was brought down from the side of one of the buildings. The Imperial Ottoman Bank, which is a splendid three-story stone edifice, was pierced by a shell, and had a large section of its front ornamental balcony demolished. The new custom house on the quay was very badly damaged; the most of its roof, which was supported by steel ribs, was shaken down. The Italian commander certainly did not contemplate this damage, for no one questions his denial that the bombardment was directed at the town. The Turkish gunboat Awni-Allah and the torpedo boat Angora, which were the actual targets of attack, were entirely destroyed, as is shown by the pictures which appear on this page.

THE ACTS OF JESUS

TEXT: "The former treatise have I made, O Theophilus, of all that Jesus began both to do and teach." Acts 1: 1

N a recent Sabbath, I took up the Book of the Acts of the Apostles for perusal at a single sitting. There is something to be said for that way of reading the Bible. There are certain impressions that come from the study of the detached chapters and verses of Scripture, and there is another certain impression that comes from a more rapid and comprehensive survey. It is in that respect like looking at a picture; an examination of details suggests some things that the whole picture will not suggest; while on the other hand the whole picture, viewed as a whole, makes certain disclosures not conveyed by any of its details.

There were special reasons for selecting the Book of the Acts for this purpose just at this time, and my object this morning will be to report to you as concisely and distinctly as I can the effect produced upon me by the hurried and connected perusal just mentioned.

In the first place it is a remark one often hears made, in these days, by a class of thinkers that are well intentioned enough perhaps, but certainly not very intense in their estimates, and not very searching in their study of revealed truth—that all a man needs to know and to be is what he can know and become by the study and practice of the four Gospels. I have in other days so often said the same thing myself that I have on that account a larger sympathy with and a profounder pity for others who are similarly minded. What the philosophical world at the present time seems anxious to know, and what certainly every one of us needs to know, is all possible that can be learned of the character and ministry of Jesus Christ.

Now if all that we can know of that character and ministry is what is contained in the four Gospels, then we might be warranted in stopping there and treating subsequent portions of the New Testament, and in particular the Acts, as commendable enough as a history of human achievement, but as of no special worth viewed as exhibitive of the temper and work of Jesus. Remembering now that Luke wrote the third Gospel, and that he also wrote the Acts, it is important to notice, from the words that we have chosen as text, that he considered this second writing of his, viz., the Acts, to be not at all distinct from his previous one—the third Gospel—but a kind of continuation of that Gospel. And not only that, but it is evident from our text that he considered this second writing, what we call the Acts of the Apostles, to be not so much a history of what the apostles did, as a continuation of the history of what Jesus did, a sort of Gospel carried on into volume second. He says: "The former treatise [third Gospel] have I made of all that Jesus began to do and teach." The emphasis wants to fall on the word "began." Which is as though he had said, "In the present treatise I am going on to relate what Jesus continued to do and to teach." So that, as understood by Luke, the treatise we are upon this morning, and that is generally called the Acts of the Apostles, is really the second part, the second volume, of the history of the Acts of Jesus.

Jesus Still Working Though Invisible

Such a conception of the book, which is certainly Luke's conception, instantly lights it up with a peculiar and a momentous meaning. The book would be sufficiently interesting if read as a record of what was said and done by Peter and John, Stephen and Apollos, Paul and Silas; but interesting with a transcendent impressiveness if conceived of as a narrative of the earthly working of Jesus during the period that followed his visible withdrawal from the earth at his ascension over Olivet—bodily absent, but personally present still.

And what is hinted at in this first verse of the book you will find distinctly worked out and made actual through the body of the book. With all of human activity that is described, and most graphically described, it is all projected upon a background of Christ activity. You go on realizing more and more that, after all, just as in the Gospels, it is Jesus that is the worker. It was Jesus that chose the twelfth apostle and so filled the vacancy created by the apostasy of Judas. It was Jesus that poured out the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost. (You can verify these points by your own reading.) It was Jesus that healed the lame man at the gate of the temple. It was Jesus that stood by Stephen in the hour of his martyrdom. It was Jesus that met Saul on his way to Damascus and said to him, "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest." In what Luke calls his "former treatise," he describes the way in which Christ worked in the midst of his disciples while still visibly and bodily among them, just as in one of the two miracles of the draft of fishes Christ was distinctly among his disciples and in the boat with them. In what Luke gives here in his second treatise, he describes the way in which the same Christ worked with his disciples after he had become invisible to them and physically removed from them, much as in the second miracle of the draft of fishes he stood apart from his disciples on the shore, obscured in the uncertain light of the early morning, and only half recognized by them, although equally, as in the former case, the doer of the work and the producer of the result.

That is one impression then that came to me from the quick and continuous reading of this biography: that it disclosed to me the Christ texture of the events it describes and the truths it teaches, and left me feeling that in the truest sense of the term it ought not to be called the "Acts of the Apostles," but the second volume of the "Acts of Jesus Christ."

The Baptism with Fire

Such reading of the book as I have described makes one also keenly sensible how wonderful and telling a thing is that which the book calls Christ's baptism. There is what we know as John's baptism —the baptism of repentance. When John the Baptizer appeared, all classes of people were stirred by his searching preaching, and went out into the wilderness to him in droves to be baptized by him. Common people, custom house officers, and the soldiery even, came under his mysterious and magnificent power. Many construed him and his message and his water-baptism as finality, leaving nothing more to be expected, nothing further to be needed. He had to repel the crowds, shake off the popular admiration for him, and remind them that he was only a forerunner and outrider clearing the way for another still to come, whose baptism should be not a baptism of water, but a baptism with the Holy Ghost and with fire. One is a baptism of cleansing from sin, the other a baptism of divine life unto righteousness. One is a getting rid of what is carnal, the other is a taking on, and a taking in, of something that widens a man out till he is broader than man and builds him up till he is superior to man. There is a great deal of practical skepticism about this matter of Christ baptizing with the Holy Ghost as opposed to John's baptism with water. There is skepticism outside of the church, naturally enough, and, unnaturally enough, there is what amounts to skepticism on the inside of the church. The demand that we preachers are continually making upon our people and that people are making upon themselves is to repent—nothing but to repent, and bring forth fruits worthy of repentance. But that is only to meet the demands urged by John the Baptist. If that were the whole, then the world would have needed no Christ so far forth, for John preached that as well and as pungently as any preacher, human or divine, could have preached it; and Christ could have saved himself the time and the pains of his earthly mission. And will you notice in particular the fact that you can go clear through the Gospel, even up to the moment of Christ's visible withdrawal from the world, without coming upon anything like a distinct fulfilment of the assurance made by the Baptist, when he declared of Jesus that he should baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire. In the first volume of the Acts of Jesus—that is to say, in the "Gospel" technically so called—there is only the most uncertain mention made of his administering such baptism. Prior to his ascension, practically speaking, he did not commence to administer such baptism. And not only that, but, as you who know the Scriptures will recall, he definitely stated that it was not till he had gone away that his spirit-power in the person of the Comforter, the Strengthener, could be expected to be visited upon them. So that if you read only the Gospels, as some are contenting themselves with doing, and skip the second volume of Jesus' life as given in the particular book we are this morning upon, of course Holy Ghost baptism is bound to be to you only an idea and a myth, with no historic reality to authenticate it. But when you come back from Olivet and the Ascension, when you finish reading "the former treatise," as Luke calls it, treatise number one of what Jesus began to do, and turn over the leaf into treatise number two, of what Jesus, the invisible but the present and personal Jesus, continued to do, and climb into the "upper chamber" and watch the disciples as the power of the Lord came upon them (and it never had come upon them before), and see them moving under the inspiration of that power, then you begin to realize what a weak dilute, comparatively speaking, water baptism is, and what an unspeakable and overwhelming reality Holy Ghost baptism is.

Read the Gospels as admiringly as you please, eulogize their blessed contents as glowingly as you will, it is not in them, unaidedly, to save the world, or even to move the world. For three years and a half the disciples had had Gospel and Gospel only, and that not written Gospel merely, but Gospel in the very person of Jesus Christ; yet at the end of that period they were only as so many wooden images and limp rags, so far as ability to stir the world and make history was concerned. It is not fair to the Scriptures to camp down upon some portion of God's Word that we may like, and that happens to fall in with our own preconceived moral and intellectual notions. It is too much like making a Bible of our own, instead of dutifully and teachably accepting and appropriating the Bible that God has given us; and the result of it is that, because we use only a garbled Bible, we never get farther than to a fragmentary Christianity. That is the second lesson that came to me from the hurried reading of the book: it showed to me the spirit-energy of Christ (revealed in the Acts) in its relation to the mere teaching-efficiency of Christ (described in the Gospel). It suggested to me that what we find in the Acts—Christ's outpouring of himself in power—stands to the mere Gospel very much as what we call an "enacting clause" stands to a legislative act. It is what gives the legislative act its effect; it is what makes of that act a reality, an efficiency in the domain of real event. The Gospel, if you stop at the end of the Gospel, is nothing but a sublime preparation, it is a grand getting ready to do something but without doing it, a bud full of blossom but that has not blossomed. Before Christ became invisible and baptized with the Holy Ghost and with fire, Christianity was merely a beginning; now it is a consummation. Then it was an idea. Now it is an event. And no man can ever quite realize that to the full, till having read sympathetically all that Jesus "began to do" in the days of his flesh, he then turns on and immerses himself in the connected study of the unfolding drama of what Jesus went on to do in the subsequent days of his invisible presence, and of his silent descent upon his diciples in fervor and power.

The Passion of the First Disciples

A third impression left by my reading of the book was that of the hearty way, the whole-souled way in which those first disciples lent themselves to the new faith and to everything connected with it. There was an element of passion in all they felt, said and did. Their opinions they did not stop to reason out; their words they did not premeditate; their deeds they did not calculate. Their general behavior was to such degree unconventional and irregular, that it is not to be wondered at that they were sometimes charged with insanity, and sometimes with intoxication. There was the constant indication that what they had been baptized with was not water, but fire.

There is only one remaining impression left upon my mind by my reading of the book that I care to emphasize this morning: and that has to do with the generous ways in which the believers got along together, the unclashing breadth of the opinions which they cherished, and the high and magnificent aims to which they were devoted and toward which they labored. Saying that that was a period in which the Holy Spirit was distinctly in control is as much as to say that it was a period during which narrowness of view, pettiness of purpose, and conflict of opinion and policy were impossible. That is not to say that each believer did not see truth in his own way, and go about in his own way to proclaim the truth and to urge it. But religious differences do not become religious antagonisms so long as there is enough Holy Ghost present to prevent those differences from running foul of each other. Where the Spirit of God abounds there is always room enough for differences to exist, without danger of their getting in each other's way. If you are familiar with the way in which commerce is distributed over the sea, you are aware that a boat may run for days without seeing a sail, but that sails always become more and more numerous as you get near shore, and that while any vessel may run with almost absolute safety in mid-ocean, most of the collisions occur in the proximity of land, where shipping is crowded and water shallow.

Now, the Spirit of God is a kind of mid-ocean to all who are under the Holy Spirit's sway. We learn from this Book of the Acts of the differences that existed even in those days, differences of doctrine and of policy. If there had been no Holy Spirit then, and Paul had been what Paul was, and Peter had been what Peter was, these two would have suspended and excommunicated each other a good many times over. And the Holy Spirit did not make either of them less decided in his own views, or less pronounced in his way of stating them; but that Spirit made a wide sea, roomy enough to prevent divergence from becoming encounter, so that Paul could vigorously dissent from Peter, and Peter just as vigorously dissent from Paul, and yet each of them have room enough to have his own way, and to go his own way, without disaster to either, and without straining the bonds of brotherly fellowship in Christ.

And I cite that simply as a sample of the spirit with which this entire record of the "Acts" is saturated. Everything is thought and planned and done in a large way and on generous proportions. The Holy Spirit lay everywhere in the believers' hearts, as a kind of fresh and brilliant atmosphere that put its own cleanness and brightness upon every object of thought and purpose. Their conceptions were too broad and their experiences too fervid to admit of pettiness, whether of idea, of policy, or of intention. And the great faith which they had in their new Master was such an intense impulse and wide-reaching affection that Jesus was to all of them prospectively the Lord of all the earth, and their supreme business nothing other than to be completely under his sway themselves, and to make his sway over them the means by which in the near future all the kingdoms of this world should become the one kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ.

Such are some of the lessons that I learned afresh from my hurried reading of this second volume of the Acts of Jesus. And I could not conclude my reading without its being very distinctly borne in upon me that in some way the old days are going to come back, the simplicity of the old days, and the intensity of them, the holy enthusiasm of them, the ardent purpose and expectation of them; in a word, the reign of Jesus as a distinct governance in our lives, his baptism of us with the Holy Spirit as an experienced sacrament upon our hearts. To this end may his church, to this end may we, wait and pray and labor, labor, pray and wait.

Make the World Laugh

By Eugene Thwing

MERRIOPATHY is the science of the healing laugh. Merriopathy is better than homeopathy or allopathy for curing all the gloom diseases and grouch complaints that make life miserable. Some illnesses need drugs, some need the surgeon's knife, some can be cured with a good laugh, some can be smiled away, but neither you nor I ever knew of a sickness that was cured by a frown.

The wise physician well understands the therapeutic value of fun and a cheerful spirit. Medicine may be a necessary and powerful agent in the treatment of illness, but it may fail where fear and melancholy join hands with the disease. Laughter is one of the best medicines in the world, and lengthens life as well as brightens it. "A merry heart doeth good like a medicine," said the wise man, consequently we may employ it in many chronic cases without fear. Set the gloomy, discouraged, neurasthenic invalid to laughing. Study constantly how to provoke smiles. Cause a few thrills of humor to run, however weakly, through the veins and to tickle the risibles. The hostile forces of disease and worry and discouragement can be driven back by the benevolent microbes of mirth.

MAKE the world laugh—not at you, but with you. The tired, heavy-hearted man or woman who has lost for a time the music and cheer out of life will be very grateful if you can break through the gloom and win even a fleeting smile. Comforters are wanted, but not "Job's comforters." The man with the smile and the twinkle, whose laugh rings hearty and true, and who spreads the contagion of good clean mirth, free from sting—he is the man we welcome everywhere. He is everybody's friend. He is good to play with, and good to work with. He is good to drive away the "blues," and make the way joyous and the burden light.

It was said of Oliver Wendell Holmes that "he dipped his keen-pointed pen often in the honeydew, but never in gall or wormwood. He set the world to laughing and to loving; to laughing at legitimate objects of laughter, and to loving the true, the beautiful, and the good."

Our friend who signs all his letters, "Merrily yours, Marshall P. Wilder"—himself one of the princes of laugh-making—declares that "God never gave a man a greater gift than the power to make others laugh, unless it is the privilege of laughing himself. We honor, revere, admire our great soldiers, statesmen, and men of letters; but we love the man who makes us laugh. The laugh-maker is a public benefactor; for laughter is the salt of life, and keeps the whole dish sweet."

LAUGHTER may be an evil and poisonous thing as well as a good and wholesome thing. We need study the vicious laughs only enough to avoid them. Some music is called the "devil's music." Whether or not any real music can belong exclusively to the devil is a debatable question, but certainly there is more than one kind of devil's laughter. The cruel laugh at the expense of another, or because of the ill-fortune of another, is devil's laughter. The sarcastic laugh that holds a sneer and a mean hatred belongs likewise to the devil. The hard laugh of the cynic and of the reckless debauchee, and the bitter laugh of black rebellion against the chastisement of Providence are all sounds from the pit. With watchfulness and prayer we must strive to keep all such laughter out of heart and mouth. It is perfectly evident, then, that laughter must be a thing of the heart. When the source of the fountain is pure the waters will be sweet. When there is "singing and making melody" in our hearts, then shall "our mouth be filled with laughter and our tongue with singing," and the happy contagion of it will catch the lives about us and make them glad.

LAUGH and the world laughs with you," runs the old saw. It was intended as a word of encouragement for the benefit of the individual himself. We may well take it as a command—as a plain statement of our duty to the world. If our own good-natured laugh is so sure to start a chorus of cheerful laughter in the world, by no means must we keep silent. There is much of sighing and groaning all about us. Wherever we can change it to laughter we shall be overcoming evil with good; we shall be rolling away burdens and dispelling gloom; we shall be curing the sick and bringing health and joy into life.

Practice merriopathy. Much of the sickness that baffles medicine is in the mind. Still more of it is in the heart. The merriopathist will find patients everywhere, and his cures will be sure and speedy. He needs no diploma from a college nor any license from the State before he can begin active practice. Even the boys and the girls may add the degree "M.D."—Doctor of Merriopathy—to their names, and they may be among the most successful of all practitioners. Happy the home that has a merriopathist in the family circle. There cannot be too many in any community. No rivalry will hurt their practice. The more there are the merrier we shall be, and the better fitted for the strain and the struggle of earnest, purposeful living.

EARNEST PLEADING

JESUS, Saviour, hear my pleading,
Hear me as I cry to thee.
Thy strong arm is what I'm needing,
While the way I cannot see.
In the darkness,
Precious Saviour, guide thou me!

In the road how oft I stumble!
I would place my hand in thine;
Thus, O Lord, in thee abiding,
As the branches in the vine;
Strength receiving,
I shall know thy strength is mine.

Passaic, N. J.

Let the darkness all be scattered
As the mists before the sun;
Let the brightness of thy shining
Light the way in which I run.
Thus illumined,
Safely I shall journey on.

Jesus, Saviour, hear my pleading;
Let not sin victorious be.
Speak the word, O loving Saviour!
Break all chains and set me free.
Thou art mighty,
Let me ever trust in thee.

JOHN M. MORSE.

So Many Things

SO MANY things to do,
So short the days;
So many duties lead
Through unknown ways.
One step thou canst but see,
But, faithful still,
Take it all trustfully
At His dear will.

So many things to do!
Then, day by day,
With willing heart and true,
Make glad the way,
Where'er thy footsteps lead,
That light may shine
To help another's need,
While blessing thine

So many things to do,
But, hour by hour,
God will thy strength renew—
Thy failing power.
Take hold of his dear hand
And forward go;
Thou mayst not understand,
But He doth know.

The Legend of the Hands

AN OLD legend says that once three young ladies disputed about their hands, as to which were the most beautiful. One of them dipped her hand in the pure stream, another plucked berries till her fingers were pink, and the third gathered flowers whose fragrance clung to her hands. An old haggard woman passed by and asked for some gift, but all refused her. Another young woman, plain, and with no claim to beauty of hand, satisfied her need. The old woman then said, "It is not the hand that is washed in the brook, nor the hand tinted with red, nor the hand garlanded and perfumed with flowers that is most beautiful, but the hand that gives to the poor." As she spoke, her wrinkles were gone, her staff was thrown away, and she stood there an angel from heaven. This is only a legend; but its judgment is true. The beautiful hands are those that minister, in Christ's name, to others.

What She Wanted

THE four-year-old daughter of a popular New Hampshire clergyman was ailing one night, and was put to bed early. She said: "Mamma, I want to see my papa." Her mother replied, "No, dear; your papa must not be disturbed." Pretty soon she said again, "I want to see my papa." The mother replied as before, "No; your papa must not be disturbed." It was not long before she uttered this clincher: "Mamma, I am sick; and I want to see my pastor."

GRAY clouds that lie in the western sky,

OUR NATION'S GREAT PROBLEM!

How Can We Hold Down the Ever-Increasing Cost of Life's Necessities?

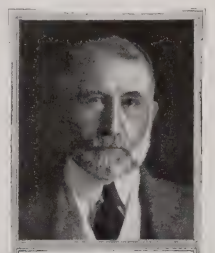
James B. McEwan

WHAT is the cause of the high cost of living and what is the remedy? The person who can answer this question will be a world benefactor, for every man, woman and child who is not a millionaire has been affected by it, and even the millionaires must view the rising tide of prices with some misgiving.

Judging by the amount of discussion provoked, it would seem as though every man of independent thought had detected a cause of his own, and every other man a remedy. The politician is sure that the tariff has something to do with it. The ultimate consumer blames it on the middleman. Wall Street maintains that it is due to the tremendous influx of gold. The man at large points his accusing finger at "the trusts." Anti-labor people insist that "the unions" have helped it along. The unions blame it on "the interests." The pure food expert blames it on the adulteration of eatables. The Peace protagonist is convinced that it is due to militarism. Economists figure that the "restoration of credit" has influenced it. Statisticians have traced it to the "concentration of populations in cities far from the source of food supply," and add that "increased banking facilities have enabled the farmer to hold his crops for high prices." The plain liver and high thinker says the trouble is not so much the high cost of living as the cost of high living.

There are doubtless many contributing causes and their variety perhaps is responsible for the multitude of remedies suggested. Most of these have not succeeded in getting past the suggestion stage. The Wall Street man who is sure that the difficulty is all due to the large influx of gold thinks it might be obviated if we could regulate the purchasing power of the dollar, but does not indicate just how it can be done. The statistician who believes that there is too much concentration of population in large cities is strong for the "back to the soil" remedy, but the great mob is still surging in the opposite direction. However, many practical experiments are being made. Trusts have been disintegrated. Middlemen have been eliminated in places. Co-operative leagues of householders have been formed so that the advantage of concentrated buying might be enjoyed. What Mayor Shank commenced in Indianapolis has been developed in other cities. Women as well as men are giving more careful attention to the advantage of buying in bulk. Probably we never shall be able to return to the simple mode of living of our grandfathers; the luxury of one generation becomes the necessity of the next. Yet even there the sentiment in favor of meeting the situation half way is finding its expression in the movement for "open markets" where the farmer can sell his products at first hand, and where the housewife can go with her basket on her arm and purchase her stores directly from him as of old. This movement in favor of open markets has many practical features to recommend it.

Brand Whitlock



William J. Gaynor

So many of our readers seem to feel that here is at least one solution of the great difficulty that we have made inquiry of the mayors of many cities in many States with a view to finding the ultimate possibilities of the open market idea. The opinions of these officials are published below, and perhaps as other phases of this question of the rising cost of living are developed, we shall have them discussed in future issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

TEN MAYORS DISCUSS OPEN MARKETS

Mayor Gaynor Says We Have Too Few Public Markets and Discusses Mayor Shank's Experiment

I AM very glad to receive your letter. I do not think that it is any experiment to have public markets for the purpose of bringing the producer and consumer into closer relations. That is done here and all over the world. The difficulty is that we seem to have too few of these markets. But there is a general movement to have more. Mayor Shank went into the experiment of being himself the middleman for the whole city. I noticed that a frost came along and froze up his potatoes and apples and he had to quit. I looked upon his "experiment" as rather frivolous. We have to do things steadily and consecutively in this world in order to do them at all. W. J. GAYNOR, Mayor.

Mayor McEwan Tells How Albany, N. Y., Runs Its People's Open Market

IT HAS always been the policy of the city of Albany to provide a place for bona fide raisers and producers of foodstuffs to sell their products direct to the consumer without paying a tax. For many years the raisers of such products were allowed the privilege of standing on either side of the street railway track on State Street, a broad thoroughfare and the main approach to the State Capitol, between Eagle and North Pearl Streets, for a distance of about five hundred feet.

As the city grew and the occupancy of State Street for such purpose produced congestion, a movement was inaugurated for the creation by the city of a market square. The site selected is 235 feet by 270 feet and is within an eighth of a mile of the principal retail district. It is not covered and is paved with asphalt. The creation of the market and its subsequent maintenance and management have met with the approval of the people of Albany. The general city ordinance governing the public market authorizes the mayor to appoint an inspector of markets at a salary of $1,200, paid monthly out of the rents, fees and charges received from the market. He has exclusive charge and control of the market place, wagons, stands and stalls, the prevention of the sale and offering for sale of improper articles, and the general management. He turns over to the city all moneys payable for the use of the stalls, etc., and makes monthly reports thereof to the common council. He attends regularly at the market every morning from five o'clock until one o'clock in the afternoon, maintains cleanliness in and about the market, and reports violations. The sale of unwholesome foods is prohibited and a penalty is prescribed for each offense of a fine of ten dollars, or imprisonment of not more than ten days, or both such fine and imprisonment. The map on file in the city engineer's office shows about 150 stands. About one-third of these are leased at prices ranging from $100 to $300 a year. The remainder are free.

[The mayor's letter goes on to explain that all the market space not leased is set apart for the sole and exclusive use of farmers and market gardeners selling country produce raised upon their own lands. The market is open every day except Sunday. A penalty is prescribed for transgressing the privileges of the market; no person is permitted to buy provisions or articles of food there for the purpose of selling again in said market during market hours, from opening the market until ten o'clock A.M.]

Mayor Shank of Indianapolis in Washington Market, New York City

A short time ago Mayor Shank of Indianapolis, Indiana, visited New York. As Mr. Shank has been waging war against the middleman by importing produce into Indianapolis and selling it at wholesale prices direct to the housewives, he was keenly interested in a visit to one of New York's greatest markets. At that time Mayor Shank expressed the opinion that though these market organizations were wonderfully elaborate and a great convenience, they were unnecessary for the handling of the produce of our country.

Toledo's Mayor Favors Open Markets with Open Trading, that the Whole People May Benefit.

I BELIEVE that the city should maintain open markets for all who wish to trade in them. I think that this should be done, too, without charging a fee larger than that which would be necessary to meet the expense of such a market.

I am entirely opposed to municipal licenses, except for the purposes of regulation. That is to say, I do not believe that a city has any right to place any tax upon industry and enterprise for the sake of raising revenue. I think there are certain employments, such as peddling in the streets, driving public vehicles, etc., which should be regulated in the public interest, and for this purpose a purely nominal license is not objectionable. I am fully aware that nearly everybody disagrees with me on this point, and that the principle of a protective tariff is applied in most all of our cities for the benefit of the merchants in them. This fact will make it difficult to establish open markets as you suggest, and the bourgeois mind will react instantly against any such proposal.

I believe that our municipal markets should be even more than mere open trading places, or rather that the principle of open trading in them should be extended. For instance, I believe that if we were to adopt the plan of the German municipalities (probably the most efficiently governed in the world), and establish municipal abattoirs, we would reduce the price of meat, and, probably, make it more difficult for the beef trust to do some of the things it is said to have been doing.

Mayor Preston Tells How Baltimore Fortunately Escapes the High-Priced Food Wave

WE HAVE now in effect open markets in Baltimore. The spare space around the markets is occupied by farm wagons, on which there is no restriction except the payment of the small license fee of $5 a year. These farm wagons and open markets are availed of generally by the people, and there is no complaint in Baltimore of an attempt on the part of the middleman and the retailer to get higher prices than the wholesale market prices justify.

These farm wagons stand there by official permit, of which there is common knowledge, and are entirely under police protection, and their wares may be exposed either on the wagons or on improvised portable stands. Baltimore is known as a city of homes, also as a city of moderate prices. Our markets are better and cheaper than any large city in the United States with which I am familiar. This grows out of the fact that we are in close touch with a vast agricultural section, and also near the head of the Chesapeake Bay, where sea-food is abundant and may be obtained at very reasonable prices.

Rochester's Public Market a Complete Success, Declares Mayor Hiram H. Edgerton

MAYOR EDGERTON directs me to acknowledge your recent letter relative to the open market proposition, and to inform you that Rochester has a large public market, which is open for several hours every morning, and which is largely patronized. We hope to have other public market places in the future.

The Rochester public market has been a complete success since its inception several years ago. The farmers and hucksters, who, before the establishment of the market, sold and hawked their wares on the public streets to the intense annoyance of the citizens, are now obliged to transact their business at the market.

The regulations of the market are observed to the letter by the farmers, hucksters and consumers who buy direct, and the police protection is adequate. Stalls are rented to farmers and wares are displayed. Many commission merchants have erected stores on the square surrounding the market. The scale of rental for the stalls at the market varies according to the location.

Chicago's Executive Finds the Open Market a Valuable Municipal Feature

REPLYING to your letter of inquiry regarding the open market project, I beg to inform you that there are two markets in Chicago, located as follows: Haymarket, located on Randolph Street, between Desplaines and Sangamon Streets; Jefferson Market, located at Jefferson and Twelfth Streets. These markets are long-established features of the municipality, and, in my opinion, are of much value. CARTER H. HARRISON,

Cleveland's Mayor Strongly Favors the Open Market and Blames the Middlemen

I THINK it entirely clear that a large part of the high cost of living, which at present is so grievously afflicting the people of our country, is due to the inordinate profits of the middlemen class, and the open market seems to be one way of restoring the balance, by affording competition. I am entirely in favor of the open market proposition as stated by you, and, of course, do not believe that its efficiency should be diminished, or its success threatened, by any exaction of license fees beyond what may be necessary for the purpose of regulation alone. In other words, a license for regulation, but not for revenue, would seem to me to be tolerable. Various sanitary regulations would, however, have to be made to prevent the open exposure of products which could be rendered unwholesome by such exposure. These details, no doubt, could be satisfactorily adjusted. NEWTON D. BAKER, Mayor.

How Syracuse Guards Its Citizens Against the Extortions of Middlemen

SYRACUSE for many years encouraged an open market in a public square, and finally felt forced, in meeting the demands of a growing municipality, to provide a suitable public market centrally located for all farm products. Twelve years ago a municipal market building was erected, and this building provides offices for the custodian of the market and his corps of assistants, and several stores, which are leased to citizens after the receipt of competitive bids. The common council guards against the use of these stores by persons who seek to deal between the producers and the public, and other means are taken to prevent operations by middlemen, the desire being to give the public the full benefit of the producers' prices. The city's practice in making the market self-sustaining is to charge a fee of fifteen cents for the use of the market to the person who has a one-horse vehicle or for a push-cart or stand, and a fee of twenty-five cents for a two-horse vehicle. A ticket good for the day is sold to a producer as he goes on the market in the morning. The sale of these privilege tickets in 1911 netted $6,515.70. A great many people take advantage of the municipal market, and the "open market" in Syracuse may be said to be a popular institution. Publicity is given by the daily newspapers to the prevailing prices at the market for all kinds of farm products, offering the public every advantage in the effort to escape the middleman.

Mayor Richardson Believes Richmond's Long-Established Markets Have Kept Prices Down.

IN ANSWER to your communication, I beg to say that Richmond, Va., has two public markets, which have been in operation for more than seventy-five years, and in which meats, fish, vegetables, etc., are sold. Stalls in these markets are rented out by the city to butchers and produce dealers. In addition to this, farmers and truckmen bring their produce to the city in carts and sell to citizens in spaces assigned to them. These dealers are charged ten cents per day, which is about sufficient to pay for cleaning up the spaces occupied by them. These markets are open from sunrise until noon, except on Saturdays, when they are open until ten or eleven o'clock at night. They are owned by the city and under the supervision of officers appointed by the city council.

I have no doubt that these markets have a tendency to keep down prices, especially as to farm products, which are sold directly from producer to consumer. D. C. RICHARDSON, Mayor.

Mayor Dilling of Seattle Describes His City's Successful Experiment

I AM in receipt of your favor of recent date with reference to the opening of public markets in the various cities of the United States.

I am glad to be able to say in reply that Seattle has already established two large open markets, which have been of distinct value in bringing the producer into close connection with the consumer, and in lowering the price of vegetables, fruits and meats. The two markets referred to are known as the Pike Place Market and the Westlake Market. They are both composed of a large building or buildings owned by private parties, filled with stalls which are rented to small merchants, but in connection with each of these is a farmer's section. For the use of this section a portion of the public street is granted by the city council. The farmers draw numbers on the preceding day for each day's location. They are thus assured of a stand if they bring their produce to town. Saturday is, of course, the big day on the market. So successful has been this scheme that the city erected a number of stalls on the inside of the sidewalk for the use of farmers in wet weather. The north forty feet of these stalls has been sold out at auction to the highest bidder to the venders of California fruit.

The ordinance under which the market is run restricts the use of the streets and the city stalls (with the exception of the north forty feet just mentioned) to those who produce their own vegetables and fruits or have had the meat which they sell in their possession certain periods of time.

During the last year it was found desirable to make a charge of twenty cents a day to each one of the farmers using the city streets. This was to include the use of a table upon which to display the produce. The charge, however, proved to be too large and has been reduced to ten cents per day, which covers the expense of keeping the market clean and sanitary.

The administration of this portion of the public market is under a market inspector, who has as his assistant a sanitary inspector. Both are now under the jurisdiction of the Commissioner of Health.

I am glad to say that our experience has demonstrated the value of a public market, and that it can be conducted successfully.

The Mayors and Open Markets

BAFFLING all attempts at solution, the high cost of living is, to the great majority of American communities, still the absorbing problem of the times. To the average citizen, it is hardly a consolation to be assured by the statists that the trouble arises from the tremendous gold production, or from any one of the dozen different causes assigned by financial authorities. What he is chiefly concerned about is the fact that prices have gone up and won't come down. But there is a simple and practical way of mitigating the trouble, and this is explained by the mayors of a number of our leading cities, who have written letters to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on the subject, which we print elsewhere in this issue. These very interesting and timely communications were received in response to our invitation for a frank expression of views from those high officials as to the adaptability of the open market for fighting high prices. Almost without exception, the mayors favor the plan. Some write that such markets are already in successful operation in their municipalities, while others have submitted the matter to their city fathers for full consideration. If a movement could be popularized for bringing the farmers, truck-raisers and poulterers into immediate contact with the consumers, selling at fair producers' prices and eliminating the middleman, it is evident that the community where such conditions prevailed would be greatly benefited. Prices would be lowered, the producer's profit would be increased and the public would get fresher and more wholesome and nutritious food at first hand.

Of late years, the old-fashioned open market has largely disappeared from our American cities. Save in a few localities, the farmer no longer drives his loaded wagons from the field or garden to the public square, where hundreds of other farmers united to make the once familiar feature of market day, with housewives bustling and buying among them as thick as honey-bees in a clover patch. To-day, the farmer loads his produce on railroad trucks at a siding, and is lucky if it be taken off in a day or two, and luckier still if he gets from the commission broker a fourth of what it brings. Why would it not be a wise and prudent, as well as a decidedly profitable step for our suffering communities to give the open market plan a trial? If the mayors and aldermen of those cities where no such markets now exist were to invite the farmers to co-operate and at the same time extend to them all the necessary facilities, we believe that high prices, so far as farm, dairy and poultry products are concerned, would soon be on the descending scale.

Is the World Growing Better?

WE HAVE little patience with those pessimists who always say "No!" to this question. Even in the work of some evangelists of the day, we meet with this despondent note. They find little to commend and much to condemn in American public and private life. Mistaking a few types for the whole, they point to American society as hopelessly decadent and tending still downward. If their vivid pictures were true, our country's condition would indeed be irredeemably bad; but, when we look around us with an intelligent eye and an unbiased mind, we are compelled to admit that the characterization is sadly overdrawn. It is true that, reading the chronicles in the daily press spread before us at the breakfast table, we may sometimes be tempted to fancy that the world is worse than it was several centuries ago, but a little investigation soon convinces to the contrary. In every past age there have been instances of criminality, of legal barbarism and of social corruption a thousand times worse than anything existing to-day. Modern science has brought all parts of the globe into proximity and space is annihilated by wireless telegraphy. Instead of knowing only what has taken place in our immediate neighborhood, as our forefathers knew, we know everything criminal and the reverse that has occurred in widely separated States of the Union, and we are transported in a flash to foreign cities and the Far East, and learn with lightning rapidity of events, good or bad, almost as soon as they happen.

Yet, even with all this mass of information available, no sane person can be convinced that the world is growing worse. Christianity and moral and intellectual progress have been doing their work during the centuries. Ties of human brotherhood are stronger and firmer than at any previous time. Even the widespread unrest and strife in industrial circles, instead of indicating that society is being disintegrated by selfishness, is rather a proof that men are understanding more clearly and feeling more keenly the meaning of that great word, "brotherhood." Laborers are standing together as never before, and employers, while unwilling to concede what they think unjust, are showing a greater readiness than in earlier days to make concessions to their men. Charity, philanthropy, human kindness multiply everywhere. Never was there a time when so much was being done for the poor, for the sick, and for little children, and this may be stated with conviction, notwithstanding the fact that child labor is still a blot on our national escutcheon.

Truly there is much to reform, to redress and to hope for before this old world of ours "gets right with God." But it is ever moving Godward, although it will never be wholly free from sin and sorrow and suffering until Jesus comes to reign. His followers look forward in faith and hope for that blessed time. Meanwhile a great body of heroic men are consecrating their talents, and, at the cost of splendid self-denial, are carrying the Gospel to lumber camps and mining regions and pioneer settlements and slums in the home-land, are laboring valiantly in the great religious forward movement among the men of America, or are crossing the ocean to undergo exile and peril on foreign shores in the name of Christ, while younger Christians and faithful women are earnest in the Lord's work at home and abroad.

Watchman, tell us of the night,
What its signs of promise are.
Traveler, on the mountain height,
See yon glory-beaming Star!

A Victory for Public Safety

NEW JERSEY has come to the fore with an anti-grade-crossing bill which sounds good. In years to come American citizens will look back with incredulous amazement upon the long history of slaughter at the crossings of highway and railroad throughout the United States. New York and Massachusetts have taken definite steps to lessen the evil, but the New Jersey law is far in advance of any hitherto passed. It provides that each railroad company passing through the State shall abolish, entirely at its own expense, one grade crossing every year for every thirty miles of track. The railroads have long claimed that the public should bear part of the expense of the change of grade, but, as Assemblyman Egan of Hudson County pointed out in the New Jersey contest, the courts have decided that the roads must make the crossing safe. The bewildering number of tragedies proved that they were not safe, and there would seem to be no reason why the roads should not be compelled to make them so. The new bill provides, however, that when a municipality petitions for the removal of a particular crossing it shall pay 15 per cent. of the cost.

A wholesome side lesson from this popular victory in New Jersey is the demonstration that even a small town can have a big influence if its men get busy. The present legislation at Trenton was largely the result of the determined effort of a number of the citizens of Ridgefield Park, in Bergen County, where so many persons have been killed at a bad crossing that mass-meetings were held and a strong delegation of voters sent to Trenton to appeal directly to Governor Wilson. The men appointed did not beg off because of the pressure of other duties, but took more than one trip to the State capital, with the result that, although the bill was vigorously opposed at first, it was finally carried through the Assembly with only one dissenting vote.

Our China Orphan Fund Growing

EVERY mail brings letters to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD containing assurances of sympathy and practical help for the famine orphans of China. Our appeal in behalf of the seven hundred little ones who need to be provided for has awakened the interest of many generous-hearted people of all denominations. An opportunity is afforded for churches, Sunday Schools, Bible classes and religious and benevolent organizations to do special service by helping the missionaries to shelter and train these little waifs, many of whom, under Christian care, will ultimately become valuable aids in spreading the Gospel among their own people. China is to-day the world's greatest missionary problem, and no better or more direct service can be rendered to the cause of religion in that country than by assisting the missionaries in transforming these little heathen boys and girls into capable, self-supporting Christian men and women. We invite every reader of this journal to have a share in this gracious work for Christ and humanity. Send in your gift for the China famine orphans now, that the work already begun may go on, under God's blessing, to successful completion. Address all contributions to the China Famine Orphan Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York. Acknowledgment of recent contributions will be found on another page of this issue.

General Notes

—A NUMBER OF lives were lost in the collision of the Peninsular and Oriental liner Oceana with the German bark Pissauga, off Beachy Head on March 16. The Oceana went to the bottom with $5,000,000 in specie. It was at first reported that 500 passengers were on board the wrecked liner, but most of the travelers booked for the voyage were to join the steamer at Marseilles, and thus escaped the accident.

—THE RETURN of a verdict of not guilty, on March 27, in the case of the United States against ten Chicago meat packers brought to a close a ten-year conflict which has been waged by the government against the so-called Beef Trust. The government charged that the indicted men had maintained prices throughout the country by means of a pool, the members of which met every Tuesday to exchange information and allot territory for the shipment of meat. The indictment was brought under the Sherman anti-trust law, giving the criminal clauses of that act the most effective try-out they have ever yet received. The verdict is taken to mean that the supplemental indictments against the packers charging monopoly and restraint of trade will be dismissed. It is also supposed that the British War Office will, as the result of the acquittal of the packers, remove its embargo against meats sold by members of the trust.

—SOME TIME AGO, the cable agencies sent out a statement to the effect that a band of Moravians at Lodz, in Russian Poland, had indulged in fanatical excesses and attempted to crucify one of their number. The authorities, however, interfered just in time to avoid a tragic climax. Now, a letter from Pastor Paul Wunderling, a Moravian minister at Lodz, to the editor of the Moravian Messenger gives the correct version. The disturbers were not Moravians, but Mariavites, a sect which seceded from the Catholic Church about ten years ago, and which had a stormy career in consequence of the efforts of the Catholics to prevent its growth. Pastor Wunderling states that there never was any attempt at a crucifixion, although exaggerated reports were circulated by the Catholic press in that country concerning the Mariavites. The cable agencies have corrected their misstatement, and in justice to our Moravian friends, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which referred to the matter at the time, takes pleasure in stating the facts, which in no wise reflect upon the worthy Moravian denomination.

Terrible Engine Explosion

OVER twenty-five persons were killed and a hundred more were maimed when the boiler of a huge locomotive blew up in the yards of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company at San Antonio, Texas. Most of the men working in the shops and those killed in the catastrophe were strike-breakers brought into San Antonio at the time of the strike of the shop-men in the Harriman lines last fall. Some charge that a high explosive was the cause of the tragedy, while the general opinion is that by some carelessness cold water was admitted into the heated and almost empty coils, which caused the disaster. A committee of investigation has been appointed, which will find and give to the public the cause of the horrible event. The engine had just been taken from the roundhouse to haul passenger train No. 9, and was standing between the roundhouse and the machine shops when the explosion occurred. The dead, the dying and the maimed were scattered over a wide area. A block or two away large pieces of wreckage fell with the shower of iron bolts and splinters of steel that rained to the earth. The engine itself was converted into a junk heap. The crown-sheet of the boiler blew two thousand feet high, and in its fall cut two large trees to pieces. A piece of the engine penetrated a house several blocks away, injuring a woman. It is said that no such disastrous locomotive explosion ever occurred on any of the railroads of the country. The families of the dead and the surviving sufferers will have the deep sympathy of the people of our country, and there will be the hope that we may be spared a repetition of such a tragedy and the cause that produced it. The disasters of the ocean and on shore, in mid-air, on the roadways, in the mines, the accidents and the sudden deaths everywhere should remind us of our mortality and of the wisdom of obeying the injunction of the great World-Teacher:

Be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh. (Matt. 24: 44.)

The Wreckage of the Engine

Tragedy of Double Life

JOSEPH DIAMOND, a child of one of the quiet, comfortably well-to-do families of upper New York City, appeared to his family in every regard as an ideal son. He wrote them regularly, and made them visits at their home with the greatest loyalty and delight. He told his parents he had a prosperous huckstering business, and they believed him. The other Friday night he wrote them he would be home to spend the Sabbath with them as he often did. On Sunday the parents got word that their boy had been killed as a burglar in Philadelphia, and that his body was in the morgue awaiting directions. The young man was a professional burglar, with a record of crime in many of the cities of the country. This is one of the darkest and most pitiable cases of a double life on record. It does seem that good judges of human nature could have seen some rent in the mask of hypocrisy, some earmarks of the criminal, but the affection of parents is often so intense that the eyes of just criticism are blind, and the faults and vices of children are almost mistaken for virtues. The base ingratitude and sin against father and mother as well as against God manifested by the bad son are beyond human language to describe. The tragedy that let the curtain fall upon the double life verifies the truth of the Scripture:

Be sure your sin will find you out. (Num. 32: 23.)

France's Gift to United States

THE long-maturing plans of France to give practical expression to her friendship for the United States are now complete. The new steamship France of the French Line, which on April 20 will start on her maiden voyage to New York, will convey an official delegation of distinguished Frenchmen bearing the French tribute in the form of a gift to the United States of Rodin's bust of "La France," to be placed at the base of the monument to be dedicated next June to Samuel de Champlain, French navigator and explorer, the tercentenary of whose discovery of Lake Champlain was celebrated in 1909. The delegation will be headed by Gabriel Hanotaux, ex-foreign minister and member of the French Academy. They will visit New York, Washington, Philadelphia, Boston, Lake Champlain, Montreal, Quebec and Niagara Falls. While in America several of the delegates will deliver addresses, voicing the gratitude of France for the numerous manifestations of friendship by the United States and dwelling upon France's desire for even more friendly relations. The statue of Liberty in New York Harbor not only memorializes the idea of liberty, but the love of two sister republics for each other. The bust for the Champlain monument will still more symbolize the bond of love that binds France and America. This spirit echoes the fraternity of olden times.

And Abram said unto Lot, Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen; for we be brethren. (Gen. 13: 8.)

Twelve Years to Life

THE astounding and gratifying fact is claimed that in the last half century an average of twelve years has been added to the period of human life. Since the first actual records were taken in New York City in the middle sixties, the rate of mortality has been reduced from thirty-five deaths in each thousand inhabitants to about fifteen or sixteen. This reduction has resulted from the control of infectious diseases. The saving thus made relates only to the period of life under fifty years. There is no saving knowledge regarding the organic diseases of advancing years, which afflict especially those who have been active in affairs, and who are taxed with large responsibilities. Dr. William H. Welch, in an address at the forty-third anniversary of the Presbyterian Hospital in New York recently, in referring to the close alliance between the College of Physicians and Surgeons and the Presbyterian Hospital, said he believed that such relationship would be a source of great scientific education not only in the nursing and treatment of those afflicted, but also in preventing the diseases which are so fatal in their effects, and thus would continue to increase the average of human existence. The right use of scientific medical knowledge, with careful obedience to the laws of the body and the soul, will contribute to longevity and to the fulfilment of the promise:

With long life will I satisfy him, and show him my salvation. (Ps. 91: 16.)

Prevention Better Than Cure

AT AN important conference recently Dr. Simon Flexner, head of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, in emphasizing the importance of the prevention of disease as compared with curing it, said that he regarded the cure of disease as a mere makeshift; that the knowledge of disease is greater now than it has ever been before, and that the elimination of disease itself is the desired goal of medical research. Toward this high plane all the modern inventions of sanitation and for the general improvement of living conditions are working with the medical profession. "This golden age has not yet come," he said, "nor will any of us who are living now see it. But we can look forward to its appearance, and we are making steps in that direction." Dr. Flexner was asked what progress had been made toward a cure for cancer. "Very recently," he answered, "it has been announced that a drug has been found that destroys the cancer cells in mice. This is correct. It is, however, only an indication of the hope of a cure in the human race." Science is striving to answer the prayer:

I wish above all things that thou mayest prosper and be in health, even as thy soul prospereth. (III. John 2.)

Potash and Iron Discovered

RECENT discoveries of deposits of potash in California and of fabulous quantities of iron ore in Pennsylvania promise an increase of wealth to the nation. A telegram from Washington, D. C., the other day announced the fact that a valuable discovery of soluble potash salts had been made in the Mohave Desert, in the southern part of California, by field representatives of the Bureau of Soils and the Geological Survey. The potash was found in a partly dried-up lake. The government experts declare there are indications of millions of tons of it. The government bureaus for some time had sought throughout the country for potash, believing a supply would be found. At present the United States and other nations are almost entirely dependent upon Germany for potash. Disagreement between the German potash trust and American buyers not long ago threatened serious complications. The great value of the find is that the product is in readily available commercial form. Potash is known to exist in many places in the United States, but in most of the cases it is not available commercially. A telegram from Pittsburg, dated the same day as the one from Washington, claimed that a billion-ton iron ore deposit had been discovered in Fulton County, Pennsylvania, and that the steel men of that city credited the report. If the enormity of the quantity and the richness of the quality shall prove what is claimed the discoveries will mean an era of the greatest prosperity the singularly prosperous Pittsburg district has ever had. In our healthy climate, in our fertile soil, in our refreshing streams, in our majestic mountains with their wealth of ores, in our civil and religious institutions, in our momentous activities and in the divine providence, we can easily believe that the Psalmist referred to us as the modern chosen Israel as well as to the old when he said:

He hath not dealt so with any nation. (Ps. 147: 20.)

Meeting Uncle Sam's "Picture Brides"

BY MARY E. BAMFORD

I STOOD near the end of Pier No. 15, on San Francisco's water front waiting for the steamer Angel Island to convey me down the bay to the United States Immigrant Station on the island for which the boat is named.

"There she is, two or three miles off!" said the man in charge of the wharf, pointing to a black smudge on the sparkling bay. The little crowd that waited on the pier consisted of some Chinese and Japanese and several Americans, all bound for Angel Island on some immigration business. There was one prettily dressed, bareheaded Chinese girl with two pink roses and a pink and white ribbon around her hair, who watched while an older, pudgy little Chinese woman with her was allowed to fish by an American fisherman sitting on the wharf's edge. The wind blew back the edges of the Chinese woman's shom (blouse), and showed it was lined with yellow and white fur. In a little while, with anything but Oriental patience, she gave up the unsuccessful fishing and went away. Soon the fisherman brought up a little silvery fish, and went across the pier to show his catch to the Chinese woman.

"Say!" he cried, "you no savvy to catch the fish!" At this she only smiled good-naturedly and rose to join the group at the wharf's edge. In going past me, she unintentionally pushed me.

"Oh, excuse!" she begged in delightfully accented English.

Here came the Angel Island, the blue flag with stars fluttering in front, another flag with U. S. I. S. surmounting the center of the vessel, and the Stars and Stripes behind. A rope was thrown over the piling on the wharf, but a gulf of water yawned below. A sloping board possessing two visible cracks was laid from wharf to upper deck. The first man who essayed that board held a typewriter in his arms, slipped, almost fell—to the horror of the Chinese girl next to me, who covered her face—and regained his footing on the wharf. There was a rumor that a gangplank existed, but it did not appear. We had not even a rope to hold to. A deck-hand stretched his brawny arm from the vessel. The wharfmaster helped us behind. The Chinese woman went first. "You can't fall if you try!" said the wharf man to me when my turn came.

The deck-hand grasped my hand, and I was over the gulf. Afterward we stood and watched our fellow victims cross. Every man, be he Japanese or Chinese, seemed ready to accept that deck-hand's helpful pull aboard.

Northward we went on San Francisco Bay, passing Alcatraz Island, with its fortifications commanding the entrance to the Golden Gate. Gradually we neared Angel Island and it was at the wharf opposite the white Administration Building that we disembarked, and went up the path to be greeted at the door by cries of "Are you a witness? Are you a witness?"

It is here that Uncle Sam decides on the cases of Orientals, whether or not they shall be allowed to dwell with us. Not being a witness, but a visitor, I was delivered over to a young man who showed me the Chinese dining-room, with the wired-in runway leading to it. There were long clean tables, and a sign up high in Chinese, which was interpreted by my companion as warning the Chinese against throwing any of their food on the floor, or creating any disturbance. I was allowed to step to the door of the big kitchen that cost the United States $20,000. There were a chef and three assistants. Two shining copper boilers caught my eye. "Those are for coffee, I suppose," I said. "Tea," responded Joe. "Chinamen want tea." Of course they do, I should have known.

The Two "Picture Brides" Who Were Under Age

We passed up a long flight of stairs to the Chinese and Japanese quarters, where an old captain showed me around. Sanitary white beds that would turn up were set in rows through the middle of the rooms. Afterward I was allowed to look around out of doors, but I soon wandered back to the Administration Building. This time my attention went first to a group of young people. Who were these Japanese girls and young men—thirty in all—occupying seats inside a railed-off section of the great room? The explanation was not hard to obtain: "Japanese picture brides" and their expectant bridegrooms. The girls had come on the steamer Mongolia two days before. The pretty, polite, small people! They were chatting together like a company of Americans, and one young man certainly knew how to make love to his girl, for he had his arm around her neck, and as she turned her pretty face over his shoulder, I saw that she liked it, for her eyes were bright and she was smiling and showing her white teeth.

The Administration and Other Buildings at Angel Island

For the most part, however, the young people were sitting talking. The men, having lived in this country, were in American clothes, but the girls were bareheaded and in Japanese costume. One pretty girl in lilac, with her obi tied at the left side, faced me, so that I had a full view of her beautiful kimono, and the wonderful coiffure that crowned her happy face. Two of the Japanese girls wore American clothes and hats. "I suppose those are witnesses," I said to the old doorkeeper. "Oh, no," he said; "their young men brought them American suits in two suit cases, and the girls went off into another room and changed their Japanese clothes." There they sat, the two picture brides, Americanized already!

Japanese Girls
Being Vaccinated Before Going Ashore

It seems that many "picture brides" have never seen their future husbands until they meet them at Angel Island. The matter has been prearranged by one whom a bright Chinaman speaking to me called a "peacemaker." We should call him a "go-between." Some young Japanese man in San Francisco, or in Sacramento Valley, Watsonville, or San José, says to another, "Do you know any girl in Japan who would come over here and marry me?" Perhaps his friend knows of some one, or he may go to the Japanese society that helps these marriages along. A photograph of the young man goes to Japan. Letters are exchanged, and the girl sends her picture to California. The girl's parents make the arrangements. The "go-between" knows probably whether the young man is a worker or an idler, and it is his business to make sure that the arrangement is going to be satisfactory to all concerned. The girl comes as a "picture bride" to Angel Island.

It has been stated that the girls are actually married to the pictures of their bridegrooms by a Shinto or other native ceremony before they leave Japan. Several attempts have been made to verify this assertion, but it seems as easy to

MAKING CROOKED MEN STRAIGHT

BY SOME well-meaning folks Rollo H. McBride has been called "The Apostle to the Bums"; by others he has been spoken of as the manager of "Chicago's Man Factory"; but the phrase that fits him best, and one which would meet with his own heartiest approval, would be "The Convict's Brother."

McBride is a product of the underworld. Because he has been through experiences similar to those of the men whom he befriends, and because he is able to look upon life from their point of view, he is able to accomplish results where other men would fail. He receives the confidence of the derelicts of society because he meets them as a brother and treats them as a brother. As a result he is remembered by most of them as a brother.

Rollo H. McBride

Less than ten years ago, Rollo H. McBride would have been classified as a reprobate. To-day, he is a forceful example of what the power of God can do with a wrecked life. After five years spent either behind bars or in barrel houses of the lowest type, McBride "got religion." He was just out of prison and making as fast as he could for his old haunts. His only assets were a five-cent piece and a bad reputation. A brightly-lighted room opening off the street in the levee district of Chicago attracted his attention. He opened the door and went in, thinking it was a saloon. Instead, it proved to be a mission. And here the Spirit of God took possession of his heart. After a while he became a Christian worker, being led gradually into dealing with the men who come out of Chicago's House of Correction—a task which now requires all his time and energy.

About two and a half years ago, a party of big-hearted business men established the "Parting of the Ways Home" with McBride at its head. This home, which to hundreds of men has been all that its name suggests, is situated in the heart of Chicago's vice district. There is nothing about it to remind one of either a charitable or a religious institution. Indeed, it is neither of these. It is a home where the ex-convict is given every opportunity to get upon his feet. "We help men to help themselves" is the motto of this institution. Outlined in large letters on the wall these words are the first thing that greets the eye of the newcomer as he opens the door and steps in off the street. The men who come to the "Parting of the Ways Home" are not made to feel that they are the recipients of charity. It is a place in which the spirit of Christ is very much in practical evidence. McBride is the "big brother" to all his "boys," as he calls them—ready if need be to take the coat or shirt off his own back to help clothe some newcomer and make him sufficiently presentable so that he can the more easily secure a position. All nationalities come and go through this home in the course of a year. All professions and walks of life are represented. Not long ago, a doctor, a lawyer and a policeman were sheltered at the same time.

The Dining-Room and Office of the "Parting of the Ways" Home, Chicago

How does McBride get hold of these men? The system is simple. Each Sunday he speaks to the inmates of the Chicago House of Correction. He does not preach to them in the ordinary way. He speaks to them about present day matters, wakening their interest in the doings of the world of health and action. His talks, however, are filled with the Gospel message of righteousness.

"Now, boys, you know I've been through all this myself," he says in substance from Sunday to Sunday, "and I know what it is to be down and out, but I also know from experience that it's possible for a man to get hold of himself and make a new start. He's got to cut out a whole lot if he's going to make good; but he can do it. And I'm ready to help any one of you who wants to try. If you're in dead earnest about it, ask Superintendent Whitman for a card to me when your term is over. Come direct from the Bridewell and we'll help you make a new start."

The men come in ever-increasing numbers. When the Home was opened, less than three years ago, some two or three per cent. of the prisoners discharged from the House of Correction came to McBride for help. At the present time the number averages from 12 to 15 per cent.—nearly 1,900 men having passed through the Home since it was organized. Of this number, positions have been found for the larger proportion. Practically all of these men have been reclothed. Lodging and shelter have been provided for those who secured work until their first pay-day. Many have been helped to reach distant points where employment or assistance was certain. And all of this has been done at less average cost than the city of Chicago spends in sending men to the Bridewell. This latter cost is $9 per capita. McBride takes these men when they come from the Bridewell, feeds them, shelters them, clothes them, and in large measure secures employment for them at a cost of only $5 each.

Rollo H. McBride, the moving spirit in this great work, is a firm believer in God's power to reclaim human life from its lowest levels. "No man, save myself," he says, "knows how many times I've gone down on my knees with men in the privacy of their rooms. When there's any praying to be done, we do it in this way—not in public."

McBride takes but little credit for what has been accomplished through his personal work with men. He was once asked, "Where did you find power to deal with men as you do?" He replied, "It's the Lord's way with me. He always uses me right, and there hasn't been a day since I started this work that the Lord hasn't blessed everything I've tried to do, and given me power to help men get a fresh start."

get proof on one side as on the other. Some who have come very closely in touch with them declare it is true, while others scout the idea of an actual marriage to the photograph as proxy. At any rate, Uncle Sam insists upon a ceremony entirely to his liking after the girls reach America. Miss Pierson, the Methodist missionary among the immigrants, says that sometimes she will be sitting with girls upstairs at the Immigrant Station, and a telephone message will come saying that the bridegroom of such and such a picture bride has arrived and is below stairs. The girl goes to her bundle or other receptacle in which her things are, and takes out the picture of her bridegroom. Usually it is wrapped in a silk handkerchief. Perhaps she also has letters. Then she goes downstairs to meet him whom, in many cases, she has never seen! What a thrilling moment! Usually the girls like their bridegrooms, but occasionally the course of love does not run smooth. Miss Pierson thinks that once in a while the marriage fails to come off.

As to their footgear, the picture brides in the enclosure seemed to be divided. Some wore American shoes, others sandals. It seems that the bridegroom frequently brings to his beloved a present of a pair of American shoes. Then the matron has to look out that the picture bride does not tumble down stairs. One would think the Japanese geta, with its two heels, one under the ball of the foot, and the other where a heel ought to be, would invite stairway tumbling, but it seems that it is the American shoe that is culpable. One picture bride wore merely soles and white stockings, made Japanese fashion, with a division for the big toe, and the strap of the sandal ran up between the big toe and the next, and held to the ankle.

I was wondering if all these smiling, polite little folk were going to take the boat with me and go with the United States official to be married American fashion. No, indeed! For two were under age and might not go ashore that day. A few days after, however, they were allowed to land and were married to their bridegrooms. Miss Lake, of the Methodists, was made their guardian, and they were required to report to her every few months from the sections of California where they settled.

And alas, alas! There is vaccination, and the unromantic hookworm here appears. Did ever Cupid dream of such a foe? It seems, alas for romance, that many of these pretty brides have the hookworm, and however gallant Uncle Sam may feel toward brides, he has a very different feeling for the hookworm. Sometimes a whole consignment of picture brides have the hookworm. This means that the Japanese bridegrooms must wait while their brides undergo a hospital experience. Doses of castor oil and chloroform, I believe, are the cheerful potions that Uncle Sam decrees that those picture brides shall swallow. Fancy the taste of that medicine! But Uncle Sam is firm. I heard the United States officer explaining to a Japanese young man who understood English fairly. "If a girl spits out part of the medicine," quoth the officer, "then after a few days there has to be another examination and more medicine." From which it would appear that some Japanese picture brides indignantly reject Uncle Sam's potion. Poor little Japanese bride! Did she ever think when she left Japan that she would have to swallow such stuff to get her bridegroom? Oh, dreadful Uncle Sam!

Miss Pierson tells me that sometimes there are, among the Japanese picture brides who arrive, three or four girls who have become Christians through the influence of missionaries in Japan, and these girls are glad to find Miss Pierson and tell her they are Christians. See the reflex influence of foreign missions on California. Those girls will establish Christian homes, perhaps, in the Sacramento Valley, where so many go. The little Japanese children that come to bless that home may be brought up to know the Christian's God.

Our boat reached the San Francisco wharf, the other passengers disappeared, the United States officer marshaled his little Japanese company of eleven back of one of the buildings. It was time I should disappear, too, but I wanted to see what became of my picture brides. By and by appeared two automobiles, and the picture brides and bridegrooms and the United States officer were whirled away for the marriage ceremonies.

UNCLE·SAM and the DOVES of PEACE

An Interview Between the God of War and One of His Imps

BY CHARLES IRVIN JUNKIN

(Mars awakes from a nap.)

MARS. What ho! you lazy, rascal imp!
How dare you sleep? wake up! wake up!
The royal thirst devours my soul;
Make haste! and bring my bloody cup!

Imp. I fly, my lord, and draw the blood,
If draw I may, by brawn or brains;
But mortal folks are getting wise;
They'd rather keep it in their veins!

Mars. What say you, imp? These slaves of mine
Do question? hesitate? rebel?
I live on blood—

They've been for centuries but fools,
And slaves to silly dopes and fears;
Call up my hosts of yellow imps
And I'll soon have them by the ears!
What say you, imp? where can I best
Begin to spread the jealous paint?

Imp. Your Majesty, our Uncle Sam
Has brought to light another saint—
A man of peace, Saint Andrew, he
Who found some tons of golden fleece
And gave some million chunks of cash
To send abroad the Doves of Peace.
'Twere well, my lord, I truly think,
To check the birds, lest they check you;
If you can frighten Uncle Sam
The birds might pass quite out of view.

Imp. I know it, sire,
And they, too, know it passing well.
Some evil power has oped their eyes;
Their love is turning into hate;
They say you're but a beast, a fool,
A knave at that, and out of date!

Mars. I see your point, you clever thing!
If Uncle Sam will play the fool
We'll soon have all the rest as mad,
And sitting on the selfsame stool!
Good Uncle Sam! the peaceful Sam!
Who never wants to fight at all!
Who prays for Universal Peace,
And curses shell and cannon ball!

Mars. A fool! a knave! and I their lord,
That bids them hack, and tear, and fight,
To fill for me the iron cup
That satisfies my appetite!
And they call me a fool! ye gods!
What more, you imp?

Imp. And right you are, my noble chief!
And Sam's the father of the saint
Who gave ten millions! There's the spot
Where you must pour your crimson paint!

Imp. My liege, I think
They kick about that very cup,
The iron cup from which you drink!
They say it costs too much, by far,
In work, and pain, and yellow gold;
And you, my lord, have worked the graft,
And they've been buncoed, fleeced, and sold!

Call up your bloody bugaboos
From Germany and fierce Japan,
And Britain, if you have the nerve,
And every bogy that you can,
To scare old Samuel into fits;
The game is won, aha! aha!

When Samuel builds his bristling forts
And mounts his guns at Panama,
And keeps right on a-building ships
And monster guns, to kill and fight,
We'll keep them scrapping right along,
And drive the Doves clear out of sight!

(Mars and Imp join in a Victory Dance. Red Fire.)

Mars. By all the gods! 'tis true enough,
And if they find it to be true,
My days are done; but say, you imp,
There's naught in all this talk that's new!

THE GOVERNOR'S BROTHER

BY ELLA HIGGINSON

AT SEVEN o'clock of a November morning Governor Esterly was pacing the dining-room of his luxurious home, awaiting his family. He had retired before midnight as the Hon. Vaughan Esterly; he had arisen at day-break as the governor of a great State. He was fifty years old, and he had reached the height of his ambition.

"You are the lucky one of the family," his mother had said to him when he was young. "You will get what you most desire out of life; you were born under a lucky star."

He had set his heart on worldly things: a splendid education; wealth; social position; a wife fitted to further his ambitions; political power; the governorship of his State. He had won every time; and now, on this eventful morning, his satisfaction and his triumph were too great for expression. He walked quietly, without nervousness. His face was eloquent with lines of deep and far-reaching thought. His family slept late; and gradually, as he walked, thoughts came to him that were not altogether triumphant—remembrance of some who had gone down that he might rise. His parents had been poor and of lowly position. Only one of the children could be finely educated; he, as the more talented, although the younger, of the two sons, had been selected. It came to him in this hour, for the first time in his life, how cheerfully his brother had consented. His very words came back through the years:

"Go on, old boy. You're the one. Only be sure that you make us proud of you. There's no sacrifice we won't make for you; only—be sure."

They had made sacrifices. It seemed strange that these sacrifices should present themselves to his remembrance at this particular hour of his triumph. He had never before given them more than a passing thought. His father had worked himself to death on the farm—had just laid down the lines one day and, with a sigh, stepped from the plow to the grave; his mother and sisters had made butter, raised chickens, grown strawberries; they had—his face, of a sudden, flushed to the dull red of biting self-shame—carried these things around in baskets from door to door and sold them; his sisters, receiving no education and no advantages, had made common marriages; one had died, and her children had been taken by the other sister, poor, and already having a large family of her own. She lived in another State; he had known nothing of her condition for years. His brother—

His head sank lower; he walked more slowly. His brother had never risen above the masses, above the life of the clod. He had married late in life a widow who had three children. He lived in an obscure logging settlement not fifty miles away; but he had not seen him for fifteen years.

The governor himself had married a woman of high social position. It had taken all he could earn to support her in the style to which she had been accustomed. His youthful dream had been to repay his family for all they had done for him—a dream that had led him on like a white star. His marriage had changed everything—not suddenly, but so gradually that he had not realized it. With his parents and one sister dead, and the others making neither demands nor reproaches, he had grown away from them. The white star of his ideals waned.

Once, and once only, soon after his marriage, his brother had dropped in on them unexpectedly. It was in the evening. They had smart guests. He never forgot the feeling of mortification with which he had taken his brother into the drawing-room and introduced him to his wife and to his guests. He was his own brother—and yet a being from another world, speaking another language. His clothes were cheap and ill-made; his hands and hair unkempt; his embarrassment most painful. The governor remembered how his wife had stood for one second, pale and irresolute. Then she had moved forward and greeted his brother, polite, perfectly bred, but as cold as ice.

When they were alone that night, she had asked, not looking at him: "Will your—brother stay long?"

"I do not know," he had answered, sick at heart, loathing himself.

"You did not invite him for any special time?"

"I did not invite him at all—I am sorry to say."

DRAWN BY W. B. KING

"'My grief is yours; let me help you, somehow, to bear it'"

She lifted her eyebrows delicately. "How very odd, then, for him to come!"

"He is my brother."

"So it seems. Mother was coming to-morrow; but if you do not mind, I will go to her, instead."

It was easy enough, after that, to drift away from his relatives. He had scarcely thought of them for several years. Why the poignant, self-accusing thought of them should come now, to prick his triumph like a poisoned dart, was past his understanding.

"Be sure that you make us proud of you!"

The high position he had worked for all these years was his; but if they knew of some of his transactions that would not bear the sunlight—would they be proud of him?

"Hello, dad!" said his son, entering. "Is it to be, or not to be?"

Both the tone and the manner jarred upon his mood.

"I am elected," he replied, briefly.

"Madam," said the young man, bowing to his mother, who came in followed by his sister, "permit me; the Governor."

"Really?" cried Mrs. Esterly. "Of course, Vaughan, I never doubted; but it is a relief to have it settled."

"Oh, daddy!" exclaimed Ysabel; "now we'll have a new automobile—a dark green one, with mother's coat-of-arms on it."

A white-capped maid entered to summon the new governor to the telephone. He was gone a long time. His wife slipped a delicate hand under the table to ring for breakfast, when he returned.

"What was it?" she asked, with some impatience.

The governor remained standing. He was very pale.

"I"—he faltered—"I do not care for any breakfast. I—must go at once to—to Pleasant Valley."

"To Pleasant Valley!" The tone and the manner were chill.

"Yes."

"Why?" The word fell like an icicle.

"My brother—is—dead;" said the governor, very low.

There was a silence. Then his son, staring at him, exclaimed:

"Good gracious, dad! I didn't know you had relatives."

"Nor I," said Ysabel, looking perplexed.

The governor winced. No words at that moment could have hurt him more deeply; but he gave no outward sign.

"I am sorry," said his wife, watching the coffee bubbling in the percolator. "It must have been sudden?"

"It was sudden. He was killed in a shingle-mill. They did not tell me yesterday because they thought I would be so—occupied."

His voice broke; but no one noticed.

"In a shingle-mill!" said his son. "What was he doing there?"

"He was working."

"Working! In a shingle-mill?"

"Being so considerate yesterday," said his wife, choosing words and tone carefully, "they might have been equally so to-day."

"The funeral is to be at two o'clock to-day."

"Oh! . . . Do you think that, under the circumstances, it is necessary for you to attend?"

"It may not be necessary," uttered the governor distinctly, "but I am going." He moved toward the door.

"And what," asked his wife, coldly, "shall we say to all who telephone and telegraph and call?"

The governor stood looking at the floor.

"Say that I have gone to my brother's funeral."

He went out and closed the door softly—as though already in the presence of the dead.

There was an air of profound quietness about the village of Pleasant Valley. Every flag was at half-mast; every door bore the badge of grief; every house of business was closed; every face was grave.

"Looks some like a funeral," suggested the advance agent for a variety show, getting off the train behind the governor.

A tall man in rough garb turned sharply.

"There is a funeral, young man," said he, "and we don't want any flip jokes about it. This town is in mourning this day; a hundred men stand ready to lick anybody that gets off a funeral joke. . . . Are you the governor?" he added, bluntly, turning his back on the crushed youth.

The Governor's Brother

"Yes," said the governor, holding out his hand.

"I guess I won't shake," said the other easily, "seein's I didn't vote for you. I come to take you to your brother's house."

"Thank you," said the governor. His face was a dull red. He walked through the silent streets with his guide. They passed several groups of men who looked at him indifferently. Not a hat was lifted. Not a hand was outstretched. Yet he was sure that all knew who he was. Plainly their thoughts were elsewhere. They had no time for him.

There were no words to express his dread of meeting his brother's wife. He was sure that she must hold resentment of his neglect; that her manner, at least, would reproach him. They came finally to a small house, where they halted. It was painted white; there was a strip of green grass in front, and a white fence. November though it was, there were beds in which roses bloomed; others were brilliant with geraniums; farther back was a thrifty kitchen garden. The house itself was cheap and small; it bespoke poverty that made his heart tremble. His proud wife would not have tolerated it as a garage; yet it was the only home of his own brother—who had given up everything for him.

He sat in the small parlor and waited. Every article in the room etched itself upon his memory. There was a brown two-ply carpet, worn gray in places. In one corner stood an organ with a high back and many stops; a book opened to "Last Beam"—his mother's favorite hymn; in front of the organ was a rug, braided of rags. Two or three chairs, a lurid vase, a picture or two, a big, gaudy Bible, a plush album, made up the furniture of the room. The governor, through all his wretchedness, gave unconscious thanks to God that his wife had not offered to come with him. His brother's evident poverty was sufficiently painful without her scorn.

He arose as the door opened. A tall, slender woman in well-worn black came toward him. For two seconds he shrank uncontrollably within himself; then he forced himself to look at her.

She came straight to him—a woman stricken with sorest grief, yet holding herself well in hand; accustomed to poverty and hardship, yet possessing dignity and a natural refinement. Her eyes—rimmed now with red—were of a clear gray; they met his with sympathy and directness; there was not the faintest doubt of him in them.

"You are his brother," those eyes said, she taking his hand in both her own cold ones and pressing it hard; "my grief is yours; let me help you, somehow, to bear it."

There were to be no hysterics, no leaning upon him. He felt instantly, instead, her mute offer of help; when she spoke, her tone was brave and impersonal.

"It was so good of you to come, when you must be worn out. I have some lunch ready for you. Come out. Some hot coffee will help you."

He followed her into the adjoining room. For the first time since he left his father's roof, he sat down to eat in a kitchen. There was a red cover on the table; spoons and forks were plated and worn; the dishes were heavy. But the cleanness of everything would have put his own kitchen to shame; it fairly sparkled. He thought suddenly of his mother.

He set his cup down with dim eyes.

Presently he heard a sound of bitter weeping. Two young girls entered, followed by a lad of eighteen.

"These are my children," said Mrs. Esterly; her face trembled.

"Indeed," he faltered in a broken voice. "I did not know that my brother—"

"He had no children. These are his stepchildren. They could not have loved their own father more. They are—broken-hearted—" She turned her face away.

After a while he said diffidently: "You must let me help you—er—let me bear some of the expenses."

"Oh, I couldn't do that," she replied, gently. "He had five hundred dollars' life insurance. It will pay for everything." Her voice was thick and shaken with grief.

"But—afterwards? What will you do then?"

"We are used to working hard," she answered, with dignity. "That is the least of our trouble this day. If only—we could have him back again—" The words ended in a sob of anguish.

It was with a tightening of his heart-strings that Governor Esterly looked upon his brother in death. The spare, ill-fed body in its cheap clothing; the face, lined with poverty, toil and patience; the hair, gray before its time; the labor-knotted hands, done forever with lowly earth-tasks—his very soul trembled with grief and self-torment as he looked.

The little church was crowded. The four members of the choir sang with the saddest faces ever seen. Every eye was wet, every head was bowed. The governor had attended many funerals; never had he seen such unaffected sorrow, such disregard of appearances, such unfeigned grief. He turned to the man at his side.

"I have never witnessed such genuine sorrow," he said. "It is most unusual. Will you tell me the reason for it?"

"The reason?" The man wiped tears from his face with a big hand. "We just loved him. That's all."

"Isn't it unusual for men to feel such genuine affection for one another?"

The man was silent for a moment; then he said, slowly: "Yes, I guess it is. But nobody could help lovin' him. You see . . . He just—just—went along thinkin' about everybody but hisself. He never did think about hisself. Never knew him to. He never put hisself forward. He'd give up a good job to a fellow with a bigger fam'ly. 'Me an' my folks don't need so terrible much,' he'd say. 'We're happier 'n most folks, just bein' together.' But we all knew there were times when they didn't have enough to eat an' wear. . . . He sent money reg'lar, the postmaster says, to a sister who is a widow with sev'ral children."

The governor's face turned white.

"His wife 's a jim dandy," added the man. "'When he was laid up, she washed for us men, so's he could keep sendin' money to his sister. 'She's my husband's sister,' she said. 'Blood's thicker'n water.'"

Throughout the simple, sorrowful sermon, telling of the dead man's scorn of self and care for others, the governor's thoughts accused him bitterly. The years of his life passed before him. One by one, his selfish aims, his heartless neglect, his doubtful schemes, shone out suddenly, as though touched by a searchlight. Through it all sounded the words his brother's wife had spoken that afternoon:

"He lived a little while after he was hurt. He spoke of you. 'Tell him I loved him just the same as when we were boys. There wasn't a day in all my life I didn't think of him with the same love.' . . ."

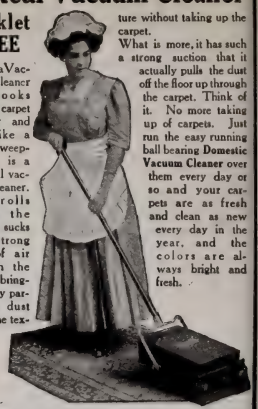
The notes of the closing hymn penetrated his heavy thought with vibrations of irresistible sweetness and appeal. It was his mother's hymn.

Father, have mercy;
Father, have mercy;
Father, have mercy—
Through Jesus Christ
Our Lord.

The governor, his pride fallen from him, and every fiber of his being touched and shaken, bowed himself and wept.

A Real Vacuum Cleaner

Booklet FREE



Here is a Vacuum Cleaner that looks like a carpet sweeper and runs like a carpet sweeper, yet is a powerful vacuum cleaner. As it rolls across the room it sucks up a strong blast of air through the carpet, bringing every particle of dust out of the texture without taking up the carpet.

What is more, it has such a strong suction that it actually pulls the dust off the floor up through the carpet. Think of it. No more taking up of carpets. Just run the easy running ball bearing Domestic Vacuum Cleaner over them every day or so and your carpets are as fresh and clean as new every day in the year, and the colors are always bright and fresh.

The pile of dirt shown here was removed by a Domestic Vacuum Cleaner after the rug had been thoroughly cleaned by old methods. This dirt was down in the texture of the rug beyond the reach of the broom. Try one on your carpets at our risk. If it does not do all we claim, return it at our expense and get your money back. Sent anywhere in the United States East of Rocky Mountains, charges prepaid, upon receipt of $16.00.

CAUTION

Don't confuse the Domestic Vacuum Cleaner with imitations. The Domestic is the only one with the patented adjustable ball bearing roller nozzle. It rolls over the carpet and does not drag and wear out the carpet as imitations do.

Happy Cozy Corner Days

THE sweetest music is not in the oratorio, but in the human voice, when it speaks from its instant life-tones of tenderness, truth and courage.—Emerson.

POCKET-MONEY

By Marion L. Gillman

A COZY Corner girl writes of the way she makes pin-money and asks us to tell other girls about it.

"I am very fond of roaming about in the woods," she says, "and in the spring I almost never miss finding some kind of a baby to bring home and make happy. After a heavy storm I always go hunting, for invariably I find that many little wood-folk have been tumbled out of their nests or hurt or stunned. I carefully bring them home and feed them on proper food and nurse them back to life. Last year I nursed four baby crows on cornmeal mixture and cheese and earthworms. Crows are difficult to raise, because until they are quite large sized birds they will not swallow food unless it is pushed very far down in their throats. When the beak hardens they take ravenously to corn and peas and lentils. I taught my foundling crows to speak several words each. They all learned how to whistle and could call the dogs from any part of the farm; and I finally sold all four of them for $5 each.

"After one terrific storm I brought home three stunned little squirrels which I named Bushytail, Tiptop, and Ishibuzzi. That last is the name of a boy hero in an Indian legend that I am very fond of. I fed the baby squirrels plenty of bread and milk and petted them a great deal. They grew to be the loveliest pets and everybody loved them. I sold Bushytail and Ishibuzzi for two dollars each. Tiptop I still own. An opossum makes a charming pet. I sold one little weather-beaten creature, after six months' feeding and training, to a little city girl going by in a motor car for $4. Her mother wrote me a letter saying how much her little girl enjoyed her rather peculiar pet. Baby owls grow into fine birds fed on corn meal mush and bits of fresh meat. I have brought up many bluebirds and orioles, and while I am only sixteen years old, I have such a practical little bird and animal business that it nets me quite a good deal of pin-money, besides all the pleasure of caring for the unfortunate little babes of the woods that I love so dearly.

"I also send aquarium supplies to several city dealers."

A Simple Experiment in Chemistry

By James Dayton

A GREAT chemist, when asked with what things chemistry has to do, answered, "It has everything to do with everything." Scientific men have discovered that all things are composed of a few simple substances which are called elements and compounds. Wood, sugar, salt, glass, cement, air and a thousand other substances are compounds; while some of the commoner and most important elements are iron, lead, carbon, sulphur, oxygen and hydrogen. For example, nothing could live or burn if it were not for the very important element known as oxygen, so oxygen is a most interesting element.

Water is largely composed of the two gases, oxygen and hydrogen, and one of the nicest of chemical experiments to show the importance of oxygen is one of the simplest and most easily understood. Try it, for it will surely interest you.

The Experiment

Fasten a small piece of lighted candle onto a cork about half an inch thick and one and one-half inches in diameter. Float it in a shallow dish nearly filled with water and set a pint preserve jar over it, then watch carefully what happens in the jar. The water will rise slowly about one-quarter of the way and the candle will flicker out. The oxygen in the jar has been used up by the flame, therefore nothing can burn there. The water rose one-fourth of the depth of the jar in order to take the place of the oxygen which was used up by the burning of the candle. We may therefore conclude roughly that the air around us contains about this proportion of oxygen. You can easily see now why a fire burns brightest in a well-aired and ventilated room, and why it is we feel better and sleep better in a room from which the life-giving oxygen has not been used up.

LITTLE PEOPLE'S CORNER

WISHING

I WISH I were a primrose,
A bright yellow primrose blowing in the spring!
The stooping boughs above me,
The wandering bee to love me,
The fern and moss to creep across,
And the elm tree for our king!

Nay, stay! I wish I were an elm tree,
A great lofty elm tree, with green leaves gay!
The winds would set them dancing,
The sun and moonshine glance in,
And birds would house among the boughs,
And sweetly sing!

Oh, no! I wish I were a robin,
A robin or a little wren, everywhere to go;
Through forest, field or garden,
And ask no leave or pardon,
Till winter comes with icy thumbs
To ruffle up our wing.

Well, tell! Where should I fly to,
Where go to sleep in the dark wood or dell?
Before a day was over,
Home comes the rover,
For mother's kiss—sweeter this,
Than any other thing!

The eyes of the Lord are in every place, beholding evil and good.

"A Mysterious Well-Dressed Woman—

"That's what I used to call a neighbor of mine before I knew her. She seemed to have a magic way of dressing herself and her children in always the latest styles and colorings of materials. Yet I knew that she was not a wealthy woman, as she lived in so modest a little home.

"You can just imagine my surprise when I became acquainted with her and learned that the secret of it all lay with Diamond Dyes. She was constantly making over clothes and 'Diamond-Dyeing' them, as she called it. I need hardly say that it did not take me long to follow her example."

(Signed) Mrs. L. M. Spencer
Columbus, Ohio

Not only have Diamond Dyes proved their marvelous power to make the wardrobe last twice as long and be doubly beautiful, but this extends to the household and its furnishings.

Rugs, portières and draperies, trimmings and embroideries, couch covers and pillows—all are possible of wonderful and beautiful transformations with

Diamond Dyes

There are two classes of Diamond Dyes—one for Wool or Silk, the other for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods. Diamond Dyes for Wool or Silk now come in Blue envelopes. And, as heretofore, those for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods are in White envelopes.

Here's the Truth About Dyes for Home Use

Our experience of over thirty years has proven that no one dye will successfully color every fabric

There are two classes of fabrics—animal fibre fabrics and vegetable fibre fabrics:

Wool and Silk are animal fibre fabrics. Cotton and Linen are vegetable fibre fabrics. "Union" or "Mixed" goods are 60% to 80%—Cotton so must be treated as vegetable fibre fabrics.

Vegetable fibres require one class of dye, and animal fibres another and radically different class of dye. As proof—we call attention to the fact that manufacturers of woolen goods use one class of dye, while manufacturers of cotton goods use an entirely different class of dye.

Do Not Be Deceived

For these reasons we manufacture one class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, and another class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Wool or Silk, so that you may obtain the very best results on EVERY fabric.

REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods.

AND REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Wool or Silk, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Wool or Silk.

Diamond Dyes are sold at the uniform price of 10c. per package.

Valuable Books and Samples Free

Send us your dealer's name and address—tell us whether or not he sells Diamond Dyes. We will then send you that famous book of helps, the Diamond Dye Annual, a copy of the Direction Book, and 36 samples of Dyed Cloth—Free.

OUR COMFORT CORNER

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

When Duties Clash

THE immortal Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm put herself on record in a couplet that sticks fast in memory.

When joy and duty clash
Let duty go to smash.

Of course there are grown people without number who know precisely what the child felt and tried to express, and if they were willing to tell the truth they would admit that they have had to fight pretty hard at times to obey duty when duty stood in the way of joy.

Somebody has affirmed that duties are never in conflict. No assertion can be more mistaken. Duties do face one another in our individual lives in a manner so conflicting that one cannot tell how to settle them. For example, let us take the familiar situation of a household consisting of parents, young people and little children. The parents are middle-aged. They have borne the noon-day heat and carried heavy burdens. They are looking forward to an afternoon of partial repose. The young people in the home are looking forward, too, and the children are not yet out of school. The youth and maiden who have had the advantage of a university training desire still further technical education, and long for the advantage of a post-graduate course, very possibly on the other side of the ocean. If this is granted them, the parents will continue to make sacrifices, and in their spirit of altruism will not permit the sons and daughters to suspect that they are toiling beyond their strength. It may come to pass that the younger children growing up may be forced to an abridgment of educational opportunities. This not infrequently occurs. There are times and homes in which one son or one daughter, gifted, ambitious and persevering, climbs the ladder and reaches elevation at the cost of a break-down in the health of father and mother, and at the sacrifice of younger brothers and sisters in the formative period of life. Here duties have been misunderstood, and have consequently clashed.

TAKE another example. There are those who read this page who have had experience of what it means to introduce into the home circle a kinsman or kinswoman, aged, difficult and exacting, who proceeded to interfere, not intentionally, but because of an unfortunate personality, with the smooth running of the household. To have refused admittance to the home to Uncle Jimmie or Aunt Susan or arranged to let either of these relatives seek a shelter elsewhere would not have been possible to a family holding in reverence the tie of blood. Yet from the instant that the elderly newcomer was established in the home, the peace of the day was marred. There are old ladies who wear white caps and kerchiefs and look like saints who should sit for their portraits who can still manage to make life a daily grind for their juniors. How shall the mother who sees her young people and her good man constantly disturbed by this imported member of the household reconcile her duty to the claims of all concerned? There are problems in life that are well nigh insoluble. Probably the only solution is to live by the day, taking each day as it comes and in it doing one's best. To live by the Golden Rule, to do unto others as we would have them do unto us, is a mighty help. To make a selfish decision is sure to be regretted in the end, for it remains continually true that "he that saveth his life shall lose it." Also we may take for our comfort the word in Revelation, "To him that overcometh there shall be given the hidden manna, the white stone and a share in the heavenly dominion."

A Relic of the Past

A FEW weeks ago, while looking over a bundle of old papers, Miss Mary Edna Murray, of New York, discovered a quaint hand-bill published in London in 1840 by its author, one S. D. Ewins, for the special guidance of married women. Miss Murray sent the yellow leaf, printed more than seventy years ago, to the editor of the Book Review of the New York Times. It is so interesting and withal amusing that it is quoted on this page for the consideration of the woman of the period. Here it is, with its assured and sapient heading:

COUNSEL FOR LADIES

"A Soft Answer Turneth Away Wrath"

Let every married woman be persuaded that there are two ways of governing a family: The first is by the expression of that which threatens force; the second is by the power of love, to which even strength would yield. Over the mind of a husband a wife should never employ any other power than gentleness; when a woman accustoms herself to say—I will—she deserves to lose her empire. Avoid contradicting your husband. When we smell a rose we expect to imbibe the sweetness of its odor, so we look for everything amiable in woman. Whoever is often contradicted feels insensibly an aversion for the person who contradicts, which gains strength by time. Employ yourself in household affairs; wait till your husband confides to you those of higher importance, and do not give your advice till he asks it. Never take upon yourself to be a censor of your husband's morals, to read lectures to him. Let your preaching be a good example. Practice virtue yourself to make him in love with it. Command his attention by being attentive to him; never exact anything and you will obtain much. Always appear excited by the little he does for you which will excite him to perform more. Men, as well as women, are vain. Never wound his vanity; not even in the most trifling instance. A wife may have more sense than her husband, but she should never seem to know it. When a man gives wrong counsel never make him feel that he has done so, but lead him on by degrees to what is rational, with mildness and gentleness. When he is convinced leave him all the merit of having found out what is reasonable and just. When a husband is out of temper, behave obligingly to him. If he is abusive never retort, and never prevail on him to humble himself, but enter thy closet and pour out thy complaints in prayer to God on his behalf. The prayers of the righteous avail much. Choose carefully your female friends. Have but a few, and be backward to follow advice; particularly if inimical to the foregoing instructions. Cherish neatness without luxury and pleasure without success. Dress with taste and particularly with modesty. "Whose adorning, let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair and of wearing gold, or of putting on of apparel." Vary the fashions of your dress in regard to colors; it gives a change to ideas and recalls pleasing recollections. Such things appear trifling, but they are of more importance than imagined.

If you have comments to make as to the wisdom or folly of this old philosophy, send them forcibly and soon to the Family Page.

Too Little Play

SHE was only twelve years old when there came upon a certain little girl the responsibility of caring for the comfort of two old people. They were her grandparents, and no hands but hers ministered to their wants, which were many, for the next four years. She was only seventeen when she married, the grandparents having by this time passed away. Thirty years have sped onward as years do, and they have been filled to the brim for her with continual labor, with physical suffering, with a hard battle to make ends meet, and with bereavement. All the thirty years she has had the faithful love of her husband, and this has been her comfort, yet she has reached a place where the clouds above her are so black and her strength is so broken that her faith is failing and faltering and she cannot pray. She used to pray, but she now is sure that God does not listen to prayer, and she faces a dark future in which she will not call upon him any more for his sustaining presence.

What can this woman do? She has

From Jacob to His Mother

THE Congregationalist through one of its writers gives us the pleasure of a peep at a unique bit of composition, the work of a little girl of ten. In a Vermont Sunday School one of the junior classes was asked to write such a letter as Jacob might have sent to his mother after leaving home on his journey to the land of Rebekah's people. He was an exile, and had he stayed in the old home his life would not have been safe from the anger of his brother Esau. He had taken from Esau both the birthright and the blessing and had deceived his blind old father at the bidding of his mother. For Rebekah there are many apologies, chief among which is the probability that she, remembering a prophecy made at the birth of her children that the elder should serve the younger, felt that Jacob was the child of promise. Jacob was, no doubt, a far greater comfort to the mother in the tent than Esau, who was wild and rough and had wearied her in his marrying the daughters of Heth. In those old days, the mother in the tent was mistress of the home and the sons brought their wives there to be under her sway. She meant that Jacob should seek a wife, not from the heathen tribes adjacent to his home, but from the daughters of her kindred. Whatever we may say of him as to craft and subtlety, it is plain that he had glimmerings of the true light, and that he valued supremely the birthright and the blessing, while Esau cared for them so little that he bartered them for a meal when he was hungry. Now for the little girl's letter, which, exactly as she wrote it, is a captivating document:

DEAR MOTHER: I have had a few experiences. I am very sad and lonely without you. The first night was very dreary. I had to use a stone for a pillow.

I had a beautiful dream that night. It was about a ladder reaching heaven with angels on it, and all at once I noticed that Jehovah was beside me.

In the morning when I awoke, I set the stone up as a pillar and went on my way.

The journey was long and tiresome.

When I reached here I told Uncle Laban all my troubles. He said not to think about them any more, but to stay with him for a month. I like it here very much.

Has Esau said anything about me?

Rachel is very beautiful and I love her. What do you say about my marrying her? I would like to very much. Leah has weak eyes now. I think she likes me, too. She is very kind to me. With love, from JACOB.

"Elizabeth, Aged Nine"

The poem that follows has been a favorite for public recitation ever since it first appeared. It is reprinted in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by request.

Out of the way in a corner
Of our dear old attic room,
Where bunches of herbs from the hillside
Shake ever a faint perfume,
An oaken chest is standing,
With hasp and padlock and key,
Strong as the hands that made it
On the other side of the sea.

When the winter days are dreary,
And we're out of heart with life,
Of its crowding cares are weary,
And sick of its restless strife,
We take a lesson in patience
From the attic corner dim,
Where the chest holds fast its treasure,
A warder dark and grim.

Robes of an antique fashion—
Linen and lace and silk—
That time has tinted with saffron,
Though once they were white as milk;
Wonderful baby garments,
Broidered with loving care
By fingers that felt the pleasure
As they wrought the ruffles rare.

A sword with the red rust on it,
That flashed in the battle-tide,
When from Lexington to Concord
Sorely men's hearts were tried;
A plumed chapeau and a buckle,
And many a relic fine;
And all by itself the sampler,
Framed in by berry and vine.

Faded the square of canvas,
Dim is the silken thread;
But I think of the white hands dimpled,
And a childish, sunny head;
And here in cross and tent stitch,
In a wreath of berry and vine,
She worked it a hundred years ago,
"Elizabeth, aged nine."

In and out in the sunshine
The little needle flashed,
And out and in on the rainy day
When the sullen drops down plashed,
As close she sat by her mother—
The little Puritan maid—
And did her piece on the sampler
Each morn before she played.

You are safe in the crystal heavens,
"Elizabeth, aged nine,"
But before you went you had troubles
Sharper than any of mine.
The golden-brown hair with sorrow
Grew white as drifted snow,
And your tears fell here, slow-staining
This very plumed chapeau.

When you put it away, its wearer
Would need it never more,
By a sword-thrust learning the secrets
God keeps on yonder shore.
But you wore your grief like glory;
Not yours to yield supine,
Who wrought in your patient childhood,
"Elizabeth, aged nine."

Out of the way in a corner,
With hasp and padlock and key,
Stands the oaken chest of my fathers,
That came from over the sea.
The hillside herbs above it
Shed odors faint and fine,
And here on its lid is a garland
To "Elizabeth, aged nine."

For love is of the immortal,
And patience is sublime,
And trouble's a thing of every day,
That toucheth every time;
And childhood sweet and sunny,
Or womanly truth and grace,
In the dusk of the way, light torches,
And cheer earth's lowliest place.

Labor Troubles Spreading

THE labor situation in many industries and in many localities both at home and abroad has continued to grow grave and complex.

The passage of the Minimum Wage Bill in England was accompanied with dramatic occurrences. Before the final vote on the bill was taken in the House of Commons, another conference of the miners' representatives with the mine owners was arranged, at which the Scotch miners increased their demand to five shillings ninepence for men and three shillings for boys, as a minimum wage. The owners openly expressed their indignation at this, declaring that they were constantly being faced with fresh demands. The matter was taken back to Parliament, Premier Asquith declaring dejectedly that the government had been entirely unable to effect a settlement by arbitration. The bill was passed, on March 27, by a vote of 213 to 48.

On the same day the mine owners met and decided that they would accept the decision of the local boards provided for in the bill to fix the minimum wage for the various districts. The Miners' Federation determined to put to vote among the miners the question of accepting the bill and returning to work.

Fearing outbreaks at the mines when attempts to resume work would be made, the War Office issued orders for ten thousand troops to be prepared to move at any moment. Five hundred troops were sent to Carmack, where there had been some disturbance, and a detail of infantry was moved to Brynkinalt. Railroads announced that all freight traffic except perishable goods would be suspended from April 3 to April 9. Meanwhile the suffering among the miners and other idle laborers grew more and more intense. Fortunately the mild weather prevented severe suffering from lack of fuel, though in parts of the north there was considerable distress on that account. In many localities the men and their families had to be fed at public expense.

While March 27 marked the beginning of the end in England, it was the date in America when the first definite signs of the inevitable strike of the anthracite miners were apparent. Hundreds of men removed their tools, and the companies began to bring horses and mules above ground. The bituminous situation continued to be deadlocked, the representatives of operators and miners in conference at Cleveland being unable to arrive at an agreement.

Delegates from the locomotive engineers of roads east of Chicago decided on this same date to submit the question of going on strike to the vote of the 25,700 engineers who are members of the Brotherhood. They are demanding an increase of 18 per cent. in their pay. The situation is rendered more complex in the mind of the public by the argument of the railroad managers, who declare that their inability to increase freight rates makes it impossible to grant the demands of the men.

At Lowell, Mass., twelve thousand employees of cloth mills were thrown out of work because thirty-five hundred of them had demanded higher wages. Twelve hundred operatives of a firm at Fall River went on strike, demanding a 10 per cent. increase. A number of other New England towns faced similar situations. In New Jersey, at Paterson, Passaic and Bayonne many hands quit work, and in a number of instances there were some outbreaks of violence. In New York the members of the Ladies' Garment Workers' Union held a mass meeting at Carnegie Hall, threatening to strike because one firm of employers tried to return to the system of paying wages by piece work instead of by the day.

You Owe Yourself a Set Ring

It's a sign of good taste and it tells of success and prosperity. You owe yourself this little "fine touch" to good dress for the same reasons exactly that you owe yourself the good clothes. Make yourself a present of one today.

No other present ever gladdened the heart of a little girl, wife, mother or sweetheart like a set gem. And no other present is better to buy, for—now—stones in such rings are guaranteed safe.

A New Stone Free

We use no patent clamp, device or method in the setting of 'W-W-W" Rings. Yet we guarantee that the stones can't come out (all stones save diamonds). If any do, and are lost, we will replace them free—no matter how long the ring has been worn. There is no time limit.

W-W-W Rings

Guaranteed Settings

To insure you against this possible loss we must insure ourselves. So we build our rings better. We simply do extra careful work. We use only the best of materials and employ the highest priced skill. That is all there is to it. Yet "W-W-W" Rings cost no more than rings of cheaper quality.

"W-W-W" Rings are investments for which we—White, Wile & Warner—are the security.

More Than 3,000 Exclusive Designs

There are more than 3,000 exclusive and beautiful designs. We are ring specialists. We make nothing else. All "W-W-W" Rings are standard value—solid gold. Handsomer settings cannot be bought—even in rings costing hundreds of dollars, for most of the price of a ring is in the stone.

Give gem-set rings for birthdays, anniversaries, graduations, weddings and on other special occasions. Set rings have been the most treasured adornments since Cleopatra's time. Every man, woman and child should wear one. Wear your birth stone. It is thought to be "lucky." There are beautiful "W-W-W" Rings at $2 or more. We set all kinds of stones.

Ask Jewelers

"W-W-W" Rings are sold in every important city and town. Go to your jeweler. He will gladly show them. If he hasn't them, send us his name and we will see that you are supplied. Send for "W-W-W" Catalog. It is complete and beautifully illustrated. Write for it now.

...bscriber, Brattleboro, Vt. —I read lately that the ladies of a certain church were to give a minstrel show for the church's benefit. I doubt whether the blessing of God can rest upon a church that takes such means to raise money.

We have always held that the line must be ...awn regarding church entertainments with a ...ry firm hand. It is ...early out of place to turn the Lord's house into ... place of mere worldly entertainment. ...T., Tazewell, Tenn. 1. Explain what is meant by "water" in John 3: 5. 2. Why was Jesus baptized? Surely not for repentance, for he was without sin. Not for our example, for many were baptized before him. Then, is it correct to say that his baptism was an act of consecration to his public work, or the initiatory rite which consecrated him to the priesthood, the Jewish priesthood culminating in him?

1. Jesus was here giving a twofold explana...ion of the new birth. He designed to impress ...icodemus with the fact that more than mere ...odily washing with water was needed; that a ...horough spiritual purification by the opera...ion of the Holy Spirit must accompany the ...xternal function, which was merely a symbol (see Ezek. 36: 25, 27, which describes the two-...old purification). As a devout Jew, Nicodemus ...as familiar with the symbolical application of ...ater. John had already baptized many, both ...ew and Gentile. 2. Jesus evidently ranked ...aptism as one of the acts inseparable from his ...Messianic calling (see John 1: 31). By being ...ublicly baptized he entered into John's com...unity, which was introductory to his greater ...Messianic work. Further, it was the means of ...evealing himself to the Baptist and through ...im to the people. John was the forerunner ...f the Messiah, and it was especially fitting that ...e should personally serve at Jesus' consecra...ion to his Messianic work, and assist at the ...eginning of his public career.

A. S., Cambridge, Mass. Explain the words of Jesus, "For many are called, but few are chosen." A friend is much troubled over this.

This is one of Christ's terse and memorable ...ayings, several times uttered. It is interpreted ...o mean that many receive the invitation of the ...Gospel who never reach the stage of spiritual ...progress where they can be said to be "chosen ...to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit ...and belief on the truth." See II. Thes. 2: 13. ...The "chosen" were those who were set apart ...for special duty to become living examples of ...devoted service. Paul was such an illustration ...of God's sovereignty in choosing his instrument. ...It should not be held to imply, however, that ...salvation is forfeited, except through the fault ...and wickedness of those who are rejected. It ...is clearly said in Scripture that it is God's will ...that all should be saved. Christ's death was all-...sufficient, and it is not the divine will that any ...should perish. Many controversies have arisen ...over this passage, but we can safely rest upon ...the language of the Saviour himself, who said: ..."Whosoever will may come" . . . and "Him ...that cometh I will in no wise cast out." This ...promise is absolute and assures us that saving ...grace is within the reach of all who will forsake ...sin and accept salvation through Christ. The ...broad interpretation of the passage would seem ...to be that while many are called, or set in the ...way of salvation, the invitation alone does not save them; they must themselves comply with all the conditions. Thus a means is provided for the salvation of all, except those who wilfully reject it. This is the true grace of the Gospel and it is so clear and unmistakable that no human doctrine or interpretation can change it.

Mrs. W. H. R., Covington, Va. The generous heart is commended in many passages in the Scripture, and especially where that generosity has the poor for its object. We are told to remember the poor (see Lev. 25: 35; Deut. 15: 7), to be a helper to the fatherless (see Ps. 68: 5; Ps. 10: 14) and the widow (Isa. I: 17), to visit those in affliction (James 1: 27), and let them share our abundance (Deut. 14: 29); and many blessings are promised to those who do these things. The bountiful are especially blessed wherever they give to any worthy cause or person (Deut. 15: 10). Remember also that remarkable promise, "He that hath pity on the poor lendeth to the Lord" (see Prov. 19: 17). It is a fine thing to lay up treasure in heaven, and we can do this only by doing God's work with the means at our disposal here. If we use his gifts for our own indulgence and pleasure, it will profit us nothing in the end; but if we apply them to his glory and the benefit of our fellow beings who need help more than we do, we shall then be doing his work, and shall receive his approval.

H. Kentville, Canada. 1. Where did Dante get the material for his Inferno? Was the work largely the result of his own imagination? 2. Did the Catholics adopt Dante's ideas concerning purgatory and hell, or were the tenets of that church regarding Limbo, etc., taken from other sources? 3. After the first resurrection, what will be the length of the day of (general) judgment, according to the Scriptures? Will it be a thousand-year day? I. Cor. 15: 25-28; I. Cor. 6: 2; Rev. 20: 6; Isa. 1: 26; Isa. 2: 4.

1. Dante's religious views have long been a subject of controversy. He has been both claimed and disclaimed by Rome. The Inferno, although purely a work of the imagination, dealt with the deep questions of the philosophy and theology of that age, and pictured the social and moral condition of Italy and the corruption of church and state. 2. His picture of purgatory was presumably the fruit of his theological studies, interpreted by a poetic brain, and doubtless largely influenced by the religious views held in his day. In the Divina Commedia he essays to give a full exposition of most of the fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion, and his attitude toward the Roman Church may be judged by the fact that he attacked its corruption, its indulgences, its false veneration of saints, etc. By many he is considered a forerunner of the Reformation. 3. In the passage in II. Peter, the writer views God's attitude toward time. The day of judgment, which to us seems long in coming, has with him no periodicity, since to him the future and present are alike. The passage in I. Cor. 15 shows that death is done away with by the general resurrection. In the sixth chapter the writer expresses surprise that any Christian should go to law; the saints are to judge the world and fallible human beings are unfit to judge others in this life, even in trifling matters. The weightiest of earthly questions is trifling compared with those that are to be answered at the last judgment. All conjectures as to the duration of the day of general judgment are mere speculation. The passages in Zechariah and Isaiah are foreshadowings of the coming of Christ's kingdom and are so interpreted by all commentators.

M. E. G., Olathe, Kan. As to the question of tithes or gifts to the Lord's work, the spirit of the injunction would not be observed by supplying yourself or your family in the manner suggested, although in a certain sense you might conform to the letter. We should not plan so that our gifts to God return to ourselves or inure to our material benefit. Whatever is given to the Lord's work, whether administered personally with our own hands or through the church or its subsidiary organizations, or through any other channel, should be put wholly away from us so that we cannot derive any material benefit from the outlay. It is not giving to the Lord at all if we attach a string to the gift. Regarding your last question, the gift that is the result of self-denial is a most acceptable one. See how Jesus illustrated this in the incident of the widow's two mites, which she cast into the treasury, although it was all her living.

F. R., Indianapolis, Ind. Kindly explain, for the benefit of many interested readers, what is meant by the initiative, referendum and recall.

The initiative is a measure whereby a minority or majority of the voters of a commonwealth can by petition place before their fellow citizens proposed laws and solicit their approval by votes in the usual manner. Five per cent. of the voters is the usual number required. When such proposed laws are submitted and indorsed by a majority of the voters, the legislature must immediately carry out the will of the people so expressed. The referendum is a

Are You Accepting Steamed Beans Thinking They Are Baked?

IT'S only a question of what you want, Madam. Only a question of getting what you ask for.

We have no quarrel with the manufacturer who offers steamed beans—or the grocer who sells them—or anyone who wants to buy them.

But the Government insists that there shall be no misrepresentation on the can. Only beans that are baked can be labeled "baked." Steamed beans cannot be labeled "baked." To be sure of the kind you are getting, read the label on the can.

Heinz Baked Beans
(Oven-Baked)

are the only well-known brand on the market today allowed to use the word "baked" on the label. "Heinz" Baked Beans are really baked—in great ovens under intense dry heat. They come out brown, mealy and tender—delicious—digestible, and with that real Boston baked bean flavor that cannot be brought out by any other than the baking process.

First, last and always, flavor, flavor, FLAVOR is the real reason for their enormous popularity.

Another thing, "Heinz" Baked Beans have the moisture baked out. Boiled and steamed beans have the moisture boiled and steamed into them. By actual analysis, "Heinz" Baked Beans contain much less water than boiled and steamed beans—far more nutriment—food value—the quality you pay your money for. So "Heinz" Beans, though they sell at the same price as boiled and steamed beans, are actually one-fourth cheaper.

For just these reasons, Heinz Baked Beans are the largest selling brand on the market today. And, remember, while you pay the same price, the grocer willingly pays a little more for "Heinz" to give you their extra flavor and food value.

There are four kinds of Heinz Beans:

Heinz Baked Beans With Pork and Tomato Sauce.

Heinz Plain Pork and Beans (Without Tomato Sauce).

Heinz Vegetarian Beans (Without Pork).

Heinz Baked Red Kidney Beans.

Try "Heinz" Baked Beans at our risk. If you don't prefer them to any other you have ever eaten, your grocer will refund full purchase money.

measure whereby a minority or majority of a commonwealth or municipality can by petition in the usual manner secure the legislature's assent to submitting to a popular vote any bill under legislative consideration or any law or ordinance already passed, a majority of the votes in any case being final. It is not in the power of either governor or mayor to veto such action. The recall is a measure whereby a minority or majority of the commonwealth can by petition place before their fellow citizens a proposition to recall by a majority of the voters an official already elected. The petition to be valid must carry at least 25 per cent. of the registered voters; in some communities the percentage is as high as forty. It is immaterial whether the term for which the official is elected is near its end or just beginning. At the election following, the accused official's name must be put on the ticket, unless otherwise requested by him.

E. G. D., Milton, Fla. 1. Is it right for a schoolboy to study on Sunday? 2. What is the best way for a young man who is away from home at school to spend Sunday? 3. How may a young man know that it is God's will for him to become a minister? 4. Would you advise a young man nineteen years old, who is just entering high school and has to work to pay his expenses, to complete the high school and college courses before beginning his life work?

1. It is not right, and it is never necessary. Better to fail in one's lessons than to do wrong. But one will not be likely to fail who keeps a clear conscience and makes the most of his time. 2. He should go to church, Sunday School, young people's meeting, should find some definite religious work to do in these services or in other ways, and should devote some hours to his friends and to the open air. The Sabbath is primarily for rest; its purpose is to fit us, spiritually, mentally, physically for the week's work. What religious work is done on that day should not be so strenuous or exacting as to unfit us for Monday's task; though there are probably not many students or others who need this warning. 3. The "call to preach" is usually a definite experience, almost, if not quite, as clear and distinct as conversion itself. It should be carefully analyzed, and if genuine will be found to fit into such matters as temperament, equipment, opportunity. If the call is genuine there will likely be advice and urging on the part of Christian people. When a man feels he is called and finds the church asking him to take up the work he may be sure the call is authentic. 4. Yes. The boys and girls who work themselves through school and college in the face of the greatest difficulties make the men and women who do many of the bravest and hardest and most useful tasks for society. If a young student has health and keeps it, he can do all the rest.

Miscellaneous

H. W. K., Seneca Falls, N. Y. Your letter has been referred to The Men and Religion Forward Movement, as the proper source of information.

Subscriber, Philadelphia. "A party writing to a loved one (a 'shut-in') and her family of little ones, said, in closing the letter, 'We send our love all corked up in a bottle, and if you will only pull out the cork it will run all over everywhere.' Is not this much like God's love: all bottled up, and it is but for us to reach out our hand, and as he says, 'I will pour you out such a blessing, there shall not be room enough to contain it.'"

H. D. J., Allenton, Mo. The word "kill," in the sixth commandment, refers to physical murder alone. The distinction between physical and spiritual death is drawn in Matt. 10: 28. Criminal law distinguishes degrees of killing, the precise definition of which should be given by a lawyer. It would be permissible to call any act or series of acts which cause the wreck of mind or morals a species of murder, in a figurative sense, although such acts might be beyond the jurisdiction of human law.

L. E. B., Orlando, Okla. Tobacco is a plant containing quantities of the drug called nicotine. Nicotine has been proved to be a strong poison; it has a severe and direct effect upon the stomach, nerves, and particularly the heart. Although there have been well authenticated cases in which the prolonged use of tobacco has apparently not injured the subject severely, the majority of normal cases show that its effects are decidedly injurious. In the young it hinders growth, and makes both mind and body dull and lethargic.

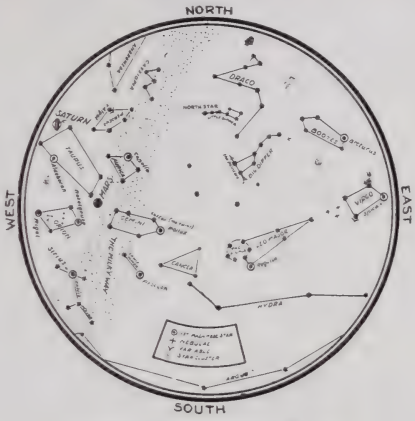
GEMS OF THE SKY

AT THIS time of the year, when the blustering winds of the early spring sweep the fleeting clouds away and seem to polish anew every bright jewel of the heavens, we are particularly fortunate in the brilliant display in the starry realms above us. As if spread for our inspection by some mighty jeweler, the most gorgeous of the stars are now seen; here a pure white diamond, there a beautiful ruby, and beyond a splendid opal. For it is only during these evenings that we are permitted to see ten of the fourteen "first magnitude" stars at one time.



A Chart of the Sky, Early April, 1912

NOTE.—Do not hold chart over the head

Rare jewels they are, notwithstanding the unbecoming names of the constellations in which they are set. It would seem that the ancients, who are responsible for the fanciful names the constellations are burdened with, went far afield in their efforts. While the marvelous beauty of these jewels of sidereal space is apparent to all, it is difficult to find appropriate reason for such monstrous names as "The Dragon," "Scorpio," "The Great Bear," "The Great Lion," and "The Fishes."

But we are concerned with the individual jewels in these miscalled settings. First, of course, and dominating the entire firmament, is Sirius, the most gorgeous gem in the universe and the brightest star in our skies, which we may easily locate in the southerly portion of the heavens, midway between the horizon and the zenith. This is our pure white diamond; sixty-three times more brilliant than our sun, and yet so far distant that a single ray of its light requires more than eight years to reach us.
